Pure vaseline warmed in a teaspoon and put down the throat of chickens ailing with roup is said to be an excellent cure for this ailment.

A hen's egg laying power decreases rapidly, as a rule, after the second year. For this reason hens should then be marketed and younger ones substituted for them.

It is claimed by Kansas folks that $19 out of the 3,216 young women who are studying domestic science in American agricultural colleges are to be found in Kansas.

Self control is as necessary for the driver of horses that are being broken as it is for the horses themselves. The driver cannot impart something to his horse that he doesn't possess himself.

A handful of bonemeal given to dairy cows daily will tend to prevent the habit they often form of eating urine soaked straw in the manure pile, as well as some other kinds of refuse.

According to poultry standards, the Light Brahma is the heaviest of chickens. The cock bird should weigh twelve pounds, the cockerel ten, the hen nine and a half and the pullet eight.

It costs about $10 to keep a breeding sow a year. If she gives you two litters of pigs each year there should be a clear profit of at least $20 from her, and you will have your sow left in the bargain.

The milk cow is her better off if her calf is taken from her within a day after its birth. If it stays with the dam much longer than this she is likely to form the very undesirable habit of holding up her milk for it.

It is a strange freak of animal intuition or instinct that makes a dairy cow take fright at profane language, but to be undisturbed by whistling. In both instances the animal seems to sense the moods of her caretaker.

A Dr. Farley of Pomona, Cal., reports an egg measuring six inches in length and eight inches in circumference, the short way laid by one of his Rhode Island Red hens. This is said to beat the record for California if not for the country.

Corn silage has not only been found to be an ideal winter ration for feeding cattle, dairy cows and in small quantities for sheep, but poultrymen are finding that it furnishes an excellent green food for their flocks and one that is greatly relished.

In order to determine the amount of moisture in butter, apparatus made for this purpose is required. There are several moisture tests on the market, and creamery supply houses keep them for sale. Each test is accompanied with full directions for its use.

Mischlevousness in a boy should not always be taken to indicate that he is fundamentally bad. As often it may mean that he has a whole lot of animal spirits that should be given a legitimate avenue of escape and that his elders have not the wisdom to understand the boy and develop the better side rather than provoke the unruly side of his nature.

Inasmuch as permanent good roads that will be available for heavy hauling twelve months in the year will be of greater financial aid to farmers than to any other class, it follows that the good roads movement will lag in any locality or state until farmers as a class awake to the need of good roads and are willing to bear their fair share of the cost of making them.

It is very natural for one who does not understand the underlying principles of cattle feeding to get the notion that the giving of animals all and more than they want is the proper way to feed. This point was made by a friend the other day when he said that this was the plan followed by his hired man, but that he himself had found that better results were secured by making the animals eat up their ration rather clean and keeping a fairly good edge on their appetite.

Every well regulated dairy farm in Germany and Holland has a reservoir close to the stable in which the liquid manure is caught and kept until it is pumped into a tank wagon and sprinkled on to the meadows. This seems like a good deal of bother, possibly, to the usually careless American farmer, yet it is a practice that he might follow very advantageously. In fact, it is one that he will be compelled to follow not many years hence if he is to get a fair return off land that is constantly increasing in price.

SOME UNPLEASANT TRUTHS.

We hear a good deal these days about the evils of the white slave traffic, in which women and their virtue are sold for financial profit. The agitation is most needed and the ends sought most desirable; yet, in much that is being said and written the fountain source of the fearful business is left largely untouched. Low wages, aping the mode of living and style of dress of wealthy women and general depravity are no doubt contributing causes tending to lead girls and young women into lives of shame, but a cause that is more potent than all these combined is the woeful lack of the right kind of training in the homes of the country in which purity, modesty, womanliness and industry are impressed on the girl in the home by both precept and example from her earliest years. The bald, brutal truth about the matter is that in thousands of town and country homes in America parents in actual practice seem to care less for the welfare and happiness of their daughters than they do for the financial gain to be got from the blooded or even scrub livestock. Under such conditions it is easy to understand why silly and half baked girls are allowed to gad at will o' nights when they ought to be at home by the fire or abed and why so many fall easy prey to the lecherous whelps whose attentions they unwittingly or deliberately invite. While some of the contributing causes of this heinous traffic in women can be checked by legislative decrees, yet no real advance will ever be made until the home conditions referred to are corrected. Any measures for relief that fail to take these seriously into account are largely futile in that they aim to stop the business at the spout rather than at the hopper.

INJURED FRUIT TREES.

A friend asks what to do with young fruit trees from which the bark has been stripped for a distance of five or six inches above the ground by settling of ice that had formed on overhead water. Such trees are in a bad way, but may be saved by covering the exposed trunks with a smooth layer of soft mud or clay as soon as possible after the injury is discovered. Another method of accomplishing the same result is by winding the trunk from below and to well above the injury with strips of sheeting dipped in melted grafting wax. Both these methods keep what little there may be left of the cambium, or light green life layer, from drying out and also serve to protect it. Another method in severe cases is the process known as bridge grafting. In this five or six strips of freshly cut bark, including the cambium layer and half an inch wide, are inserted so that the ends will extend from the uninjured bark above the wound to that below. Care should be taken to see that the cambium layer of the strips connects with that of the tree. These connections should be sealed with grafting wax as soon as made and the strips wrapped gently and completely so as to prevent drying out. Many apparently hopeless cases have been saved in this manner. In the case of valuable and thrifty trees it is well worth the effort.

LOOK OUT FOR BLIGHT.

It is now too early to be on the lookout for holdover cases of pear blight (which also affects the apple tree family), which will begin to ooze as soon as the sap begins to move. The importance of cutting out such infected limbs as early as possible lies in the fact that as soon as the bacterial ooze begins to show through the bark when the days get warmer these spots draw bees and other insects that feed on the sweet sap. Naturally the germs stick to their legs and mandibles and from these are transmitted to other blossoms and tender branches that they visit. Practically all new cases of blight infection are traceable to this cause. It is imperative, therefore, that these holdover cases should be cut out and burned at the earliest possible moment. In removing infected parts it is important to make the cutting several inches below the area affected in order to get all of the infected wood. Not only the cut, but the knife used should be disinfected with a one one-thousandth solution of bichloride of mercury (poison). This may be conveniently done by having a small sponge saturated with the solution and fastened to the wrist. As soon as infected twigs or branches are cut they should be burned.

200,000 STAR BOARDERS.

Investigators working under the direction of the animal husbandry department of the Nebraska Agricultural college have been taking an inventory, as it were, of the dairy cows of that state. While not all dairy herds have been looked into, typical and average herds have been tested in different sections of the state, and on the basis of these tests it is estimated that of the 700,000 dairy cows of the state not fewer than 200,000 do not produce enough milk during the year to pay for their keeping. The conditions responsible for this situation are doubtless the breed of dairy cows kept as well as the fact that a lot of farmers do not know the difference between a good and poor cow and have not sufficient enterprise to find out. This miserable showing in Nebraska could probably be duplicated in thirty or forty other states in the Union.
