RUSHING THE SEASON

THE FASHIONABLE WOMAN IS APT TO DO SO.

Trimming of Heading and Spangles a Noticeable Feature of Fall Gowns—Used Mostly for Embellishment of Skirts and Very Little on New Waists.

New York correspondence:

USHING the season is a habit to which the fashionable woman is much inclined. With far snug about her throat, she will be fretting to get into her spring toga. She slips them as far ahead of time as possible for summer array, and now she is on the watch for a cool day to show her idea of the prettiest fall wear. So long as hot weather holds on, however, she takes revenge for not being able to dabble in fall styles by springing fresh summer things. Many women buy in August gowns that cut a great swell when worn right away, and which metal beads, such as cut steel, are employed in outlines as well as in solid blocks, reminding one of old-time slipper work.

There is a tendency to ornament the skirt chiefly, the bodice being some dainty jacket or zouave of the plain cloth, or possibly of taffeta—evidently to be as popular as ever—to match or to harmonize with some of the embroidery tints. Needlework of the old-time sampler order appears on cloth gowns, sometimes brightened with beads or spangles. Borders, fronts, collar and cuffs and other piece effects are worked. Sometimes bands of cashmere shawling are used, and these are in some cases brightened and reinforced beautifully with hand silk embroidery and bead work.

This edge and border trimming seems likely to remain in vogue all winter. Four advance model dresses that illustrate its uses are put here by the artist. The first was opal blue nun's veiling beaded with cut steel and inlaid with black silk lace. Next is comes white gauze spangled and beaded in faint gilt tracery and made over white satin. The layer bolero had gilt embroidery at the edges. The seated woman displays a dove gray cloth. Silver soutache and cashmere bands were its trimmings. Last is a pale violet yoke taffeta finished with deep bands of ivory white embroidery. Such dresses as these may include other features of trimming, but the hand and edging sorts will dominate the scheme of ornamentation and constitute the gown's chief claim to newness. This matter of trimmings may become the one distinctive feature of the fall and early winter styles. Certainly there is no good promise of other general change.

It would be pleasant to think that the empire and the princess gown are going they frankly mean to get good wear out of in the following year. So the habit is not as extravagant as it seems at first look. The wise choice in these dresses is something simple, say of soft crepe, pastel cloths, or some of the many semi-transparent materials, something made with skirt slightly training and fairly full at the back, a round bodice embellished, without interference with outline, with a bit of old lace or some nice needlework. The dress shown here in rear view is of this general character. It was rose crepe, tucking, lace for the collar and black velvet for the belt completing its specifications.

A noticeable feature of the fall gowns is their trimming of heading and spangles. A good deal was said last fall to have a better chance than usual in the fight they always make each season. But women have never worn anything so comfortable and so generally becoming as the drooped belt waist and they are likely to stick to it. At any rate, the new gowns are sashed or belted with the droop pronounced, and in very few cases is there any show of the bodice below the belt, though often the jacket is cut below the hips.

Three gowns with sleeves varied from the plain full length patterns appear in the last of these pictures. A simple form of double sleeves was the first, in pale green silk grenadine embroidered with black silk dots for the dress goods, and corn-colored surah for the undersleeve, the latter goods also giving a foundation about the decline of these tissues, and many very beautiful gowns were sold at a song. The buyers now may congratulate themselves. It is true that all-over spangling is no longer quite as good taste as it was. The right thing has needlework and inlaying of lace or gauze combined with spangling or beading. There is every effort so to dispose the ornamentation that it may appear that it was applied after making up the dress, or at least with special reference to the style selected for the making. A combination of soft and opal colors is more liked than the barbaric splendors the beginnings of the fashion saw. Then there is a tendency to embroider and bead or spangle the lighter cloths, which is significant as to the coming season. The beading is often of very beautiful workmanship, and solid for the other fabric in the rest. Next this is a sleeve of white gauze, deep yoke and skirt trimming matching. The dress goods here was an open wool basket cloth, and it was made over white taffeta. Last is an elbow sleeve of the dress goods—pale pink cloth—finished with white chiffon ruffling. Other ruffles and white silk beaded with gilt were other trimming.

A GREAT ENTERPRISE.

Manager McDonald Rapidly Increasing the Omaha Packing Co.'s Business.

Mr. R. McDonald, who recently arrived in Portland from Philadelphia, Pa., to accept the management of the Omaha Packing Company, is much impressed with the promise of Portland's future as a commercial center.

Mr. McDonald is a typical New Englander of the positive business class. He has a keen perception of the requirements of this 19th century age of progress and he possesses the individual energy which is always in the forefront of those who supply them.

Manager McDonald is a gentleman of refinement and business tact and is thoroughly equipped for the proper discharge of the new duties he has assumed at the head of the Omaha Packing Company, one of the largest concerns of its kind in the Northwest. He has made scores of friends already since his induction into the business element of Portland.

The Omaha Packing Company produces a brand of ham, bacon and lard (the "Red Seal") which is already popular with the trade throughout the Northwest; but it is evident that Manager McDonald's effort is being extended to make them more popular than they have ever been by giving them a wider distribution through the channel of sale to retailers. The volume of this feature of the company's business has already reached extensive proportions, but the rapid enlargement of its field is increasing this volume.

To every colored person in the state of Oregon who will give his or her address to Mr. C. A. Ritter, our city agent, who will immediately make a canvass on that mission. The New Age will be sent, free of charge, for the next six months following this date.
