FANCIES OF FASHION.

WHAT IS BEING WORN BY THE LADIES OF GOTHAM.

Little Uniformity in Fall Costumes for Calling, Driving, Church and Reception Wear—Golf Girls Combine English and French Effects in Dress.

New York correspondence:

UMMER girls are gone by the girl who dreams in a hammock is forgotten, the garden party girl is a fading vision. All three have turned into golf girl, tramping girl, shooting girl or outing girl. The short skirt that she kept out of, if she was a genuine hammock and garden girl, is now the skirt she finds use for, and her golf or outing dress is this fall a very different matter from the one of last season. The American girl's taste indorses an odd mixture of the French and the English as to fashions. She is as active as her English cousin, but adores the daintiness of the Frenchwoman. She takes at once to the English woman's tailor rig for walking or outing because it is so easy. Then she begins to mitigate its rigors of outline without interfering with next illustration, where black and white silk, plain white silk and overlying of lace were the components. Ordinarily, the amount of lace is much smaller, and when used skillfully a little may be made to add much of dressiness.

The general tendency in these gowns is to use at least two materials and contrasts in color are favored. As an illustration, consider the second gown of the three in this picture. It was scarlet cloth opening over a panel of Persian silk. Its white silk shoulder collar was stitched with black, and black velvet ribbon showed at sleeves and belt. It is usual to display a dash of black and white as a relief. It may come in white stitched or embroidered in black, or in white striped with applications of narrow black velvet. Silk grenadines in new weaves run with narrow lines of silk cord are very handsome, and are made up over silk of contrasting color with rich effect. The remaining gown of this group was one of these, a Nile green stuff run with black silk cord over corn colored silk. The arrangement of its cream lace trimmings is indicated in the picture.

There is a determined effort being made to force women away from all remembrance of the sheath back, but an entirely satisfactory successor has not as yet been offered. There is in women's hearts a deep-seated dread of the draped overdress. Only because the overdress is still a double skirt that does not alter its outline from the waist down, have they accepted it. They are at once alarmed at anything that suggests the looseness of drapery at the back. So the designers are in a difficulty. Their customers have had pleats, cordings and gathers, and don't care for them. The apron overdress is being tried, its ends falling sash-like at the back over a full back skirt, or the edges of the apron are finished with soft founcing that appears at either side of the back. Some dresses thus finished are its easiness. One consequence of this is that the double skirt effect appears now for the outing dress, and, after all, a skirt that is close about the hips and that stops at the knee to allow pleating to escape, is not only less severe looking than a plain skirt, but swings freer. Upper and lower skirt are made of the same or of contrasting color. Sketched here is one in plain red cheviot, the flounce headed by a bias fold of green cloth. Of the latter was the jacket, which had ornamentation of machine stitching. The waistcoat of bright red silk fastened with green buttons.

There will be little uniformity about fall fashions in calling, driving, church and reception gowns. For several seasons women have run strongly to tailor styles, then they began to add frivolous touches to the tailor-made, and all a woman's dress looked alike. This season's planning is wiser. The tailor dress returns to very pretty. One appears in the next picture. It was pale gray ladies' cloth, with pleated skirt flounce of darker gray silk, and liberal embroidery of white and gold. Though gowns of this general character are dainty and possessed of a look of outright newness, there is no indication that the modified sheath back will be discarded for them.

A second type that is offered as a substitute for the sheath back holds the center of this illustration. It is styled the belted princess, but really consists of bodice and skirt of one material and with corresponding elaboration. In this case the dress goods was sage green broadcloth, with banding of ecru lace insertion. Lace was draped over the upper part of the bodice to be gathered into a knot, and the sleeves were corded with black. There are many ways in which the bodice and skirt may be made to correspond. Enons, its simplicity with those who can afford to keep it to its real purpose, as well as among those who have more use for the tailor than for any other class of dress. It may be made of the roughest cloth in dull and useful color, but it must be of simple and unwarmed outline and detail. So must it be if made of the choicest broadcloth and in delicate color.

One or two tailors are all any woman needs, except she leads a business life and "lives in" tailor suits, and gowns of other sorts are surprisingly varied one from another. They are of cloth, silk, novelty goods, poplins, and, for later wear, of velvet. Some very dressy models are being turned out for luncheon and calling on reception days of striped silk. Finishing, overdress, yoke, cuffs or undersleeves are of plain silk to match the lighter color and are overlaid with lace. This is an especially good design for the ever fashionable combination of black and white. Elaborate employment of this combination is seen at the left in the sonaves and their many modifications are very numerous, and usually are the same material as the skirt.

It is a bit early to wear combinations of cloth and velvet, but they are appearing and promise to be abundant in winter. A handsome model remains in the picture, where its plain portions represent biscuit colored broadcloth, underskirt and inner bodice being black panne velvet. Belt and revers are white satin banded with narrow black velvet. In many of these dresses almost the effect of a separate bodice results from the use of the skirt material in the upper part of the dress. The delicate cloth of the skirt may be corded or laid in fine pleats for the bodice, or a tiny silk cord or line in the cloth that hardly shows in the plain skirt may in the pleated bodice become a distinct feature of decoration. Often, too, the lace that appears flat on the skirt is draped on the bodice.

ADDED A CUBIT TO STATURE.

Mistake of a Maker of Artificial Limbs Pleases One of His Patrons.

The artificial limb business has its amenities, like every other calling, for there is no occupation so serious but furnishes matter for jest at those engaged in it. Some years ago in a large Western city a switchman in the yards of a railroad company fell on the track and the locomotive wheels crushed both his ankles in such a way as to necessitate amputation about four inches above the ankle joint. The man was taken to the railroad hospital, the necessary operations were performed and he was placed in bed to await recovery.

A day or two after the railroad accident the motorman of an electric car, while leaning over the front board to make a running switch, lost his balance, fell over and the wheels crushed both feet. He was taken home and the feet were amputated a few inches above the ankle. Thus the two accidents were remarkably similar, so far as the nature and situation of the injury were concerned; the two men recovered about the same time and sent to the same legmaker to be fitted with new pairs of legs. The obliging manufacturer came, took measurements and made memoranda of the height of the patients ere they were shortened by the surgeon's attention. The switchman had been about 6 feet 1 inch and the motorman was one of those short, square-built, muscular men of about 5 feet 2, a type that can work harder and longer than men of any other size or build.

The motorman got well first and sent for his legs. They came, but by mistake the locomotive apparatus which had been manufactured for the long man was sent to the short. Owing to the unusual thickness of his members the leg sockets fitted well enough to suit him, so he put on the legs and went to his former home in an Eastern city. A few days later the tall man sent for his legs and when he beheld the stumpy appendages presented by the legmaker he flew into a passion and refused to take them. He didn't propose to be a dwarf to please anybody and if they didn't give him good, long legs he wouldn't have any.

The mistake was then perceived and after a good deal of trouble the manufacturer procured the address of the short motorman and wrote, informing him of the mistake and requesting him to send back the legs which did not belong to him and they would promptly forward his own members, pay express charges both ways and thank him very much into the bargain. But the short man would do nothing of the kind. He wrote back a sturdy refusal, declaring that he was very well pleased with the legs; they made him about ten inches longer than he was before; without even taking thought, he had added nearly a cubit to his stature and had become a person of consequence among men, and if the manufacturer did not know his business that was no affair of his.

The case thus assumed a serious aspect. The legmaker considered the propriety of going East to get the runaway legs, but the cost of the journey would absorb all the profit of the transaction. Next he thought of suing for a pair of legs was ridiculous and the issue of such a suit, if brought, extremely uncertain, so he satisfied the clamor of the long man by making him another pair of legs, proportioned to his height, and is now waiting for a short, stumpy man to come in and buy the pair exposed for sale at a bargain in his new window.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Russian Whist.

America has already rivalled England as a home for whist. It will be interesting to see whether we shall follow the example of our transatlantic cousins in the mania for "bridge," or "Russian whist," which is now all the rage in London, and in many card circles has made whist as obsolete as "Boston." It is a sort of dummy whist. Different suits of cards give different values to the tricks, the red suits, for example, being more valuable than the black. The dealer does not turn up a trump card, but has the privilege of making any suit he pleases trumps, or may declare no trumps, which increases the value of the tricks. This value also may be doubled again and again by the holders of good hands, so that it is a game of uncertainties. The best authorities use the American leads, which are rather dropping out of use in English whist.—Troy Times.

The tide of immigration seems to have struck Oregon, as scarcely a day passes that we cannot see strange faces in our rambles around the town. It behooves us at this time to interest ourselves in these strangers and see that they find employment, as the time of year is at hand when strangers in our midst are apt to become disgusted with our climate. If we can get them work and cause them to stay with us until spring we will be quite sure to have gained another citizen.

"Kelly's Kids" at the Metropolitan. A bunch of pretty girls, elegantly costumed messenger boys, quarts, schoolgirls, romps, and the irrepressible kids, indicate the mirth-provoking character of "Kelly's Kids." Artist Outcault struck a happy vein in the presentation of New York's east side characters, and John Cosgrove, the theatrical manager, saw the possibilities of a stage representation, retaining the humor and enlarging the musical features. The cast is strong and admirably suited to the various characters. "Kelly's Kids" comes to the Metropolitan theater for one solid week, commencing next Sunday, October 14. Seats on sale Friday morning.
