is being done by the dressmakers who provide for wealthy ustomers to induce the latter to purchase dresses in sets. This obviously involves a large outlay at one time. a point that puts the notion quite beyoud the means of the average woman. This fact is enlarged upon by the wily promoters, who urge upon their patrons that it shows the notion to be one that will not be widely or cheaply copied. This reasoning may prevail

was the afternoon gown of this group. It is at the left, and was putty colored broadcloth, richly embroidered with silk and gilt. The tailored street dress was brown corduroy, with chamois waistcoat and white silk frogging. Last is an evening gown of white crepe de chine, with adjustable yoke of white satin encrusted with gold beads. Pink, green and gold in beads and floss appeared in its handsome embroidery. Its adjustable yoke would seem to be a device that should have greater approval than it gets. Fashionables indorse many expedients of similar character, but this one is frank, and there's the rub.

Greater simplicity in street dress is finding advocates, who rebel at the highly wrought street gowns that are so abundant a challege to the short skirt's severity. By these new standards, which so far are on trial merely, the only breaks allowed are in undersleeves or a touch of elaboration at the wrist, and a relief at the throat. They indorse long skirts, but not those that sweep. Closh of the heav-ier varieties in solid dark shades are favored, though corduroy and velveteens are much worn. When the cloth is very heavy the skirt is made unlined, and only a knee skirt is worn beneath. So long as the ankle skirt is so much worn as it is now, these ideas will not make much headway. So dresses like the first two of the next illustration are counted as quite correct. The first was red cloth trimined with bands of white undressed kid held with tiny gilt buttons. Its bodice belt of white velvet was ornamented with lace medallions, and bands of the velvet on the bolero were sprinkled with gilt nail heads. The other dress was dark blue ladies' cloth. Its band trim-
