Kansas Difficulty.

[Correspondence of the Baltimore Sun.] Armed resistance against the laws of the Union that is, "domestic insurrection,"-is to be put down by the whole power of the Union That is the theory of the Constitution. The issue has been several times made up between the United States and State authorities, but its trial has always been avoided by some backing out or com-

In regard to the Kansas question, and the violence threatened by the Missouri people, it has been alleged that it was the President's duty to interfere for the preserright nor power to protect Gov. Reeder by furnishing him with a body-guard on account of the illegal threats of Stringfellow and others to take his life.

But Governor Reeder has the legal means in his power, and within his reach, for his own protection, in case of necessity. In regard to the cases of contested election, the The legislature of Kansas must decide all questions concerning elections to its own body. When the case of armed resistance to the laws shall occur in Kansas, the President may call out the militia to suppress insurrecsion; and should he call upon Messrs. Stringfellow and his Missouri rangers, it would be an aggravation of the trouble.

Upon the border State of Missouri, he might secure the services of the insurgents themselves, with Stringfellow at their head. Militia from other States, or the regular army, must be relied upon in such an extremity, and after all, it would be found difficult to manage a refractory State.

The Virginia Election.

The politicians for the most part are completely dumbfounded by the result of the Virginia election, and the modes of accounting for it are as various as the feelings which the result has inspired. The National Intelligencer makes the following suggestions in regard to the difficulty of effecting political changes in Virginia:

"The people of Virginia are peculiar in several respects. They are not only good talkers, but they are equally good listeners; that is, they delight in public speaking; they expect their public men to address them in public assembly, and they are open to great influence from commanding oratory.-They are, moreover, a people of tradition; they are attached to their historical names, and especially to what are called the "Virginia doctrines; to which many a worthy citizen proclaims his devotion with very little idea what they are. They only know that the resolutions of '98 were passed by men whose names have come down as household words; that their fathers voted for them, and cised the right, the vira voce mode has great influence afterwards in preventing a change. There is respectability in consistency, they think, and so we confess there is, however poor it may be as a reason. We have seen a man in this old State who world for Mr. Polk for the sole reason that he who voted for Mr. Polk for the sole reason that he had voted for Mr. Jefferson."

The English Estimate of the Value of Napoleon's Life.

The recent attempt to kill the Emperor of the French produced a greater sensation in England than in France. The English seem suddenly to discover that the alliance between the Western powers hangs by the slender thread of the life of ing into the Columbia river; thence along said divide to the main Yakima, eight miles below the one man, whose life is daily in peril from the thousands of deadty enemies made by him in his unscrupulous march to imperial power. As a specimen of the tone of the English press, we quote

"The narrow escape of Louis Napoleon from the hands of death has fixed attention on the loss which Europe and the world, and more especially Eng-iand, would have sustained had the aim of the monster been more true—had the fatal weapon exscuted its work of destruction. France no doubt, would have been instantly in a blaze. All the elements of disruption would have been called into elements of disruption would have been called into immediate play. The two branches of the Bourbens would have struggled for the throne, the Red Republicans would not have been idle, and the supporters of the present dynasty would have attempted, of course, to shift for themselves. An outbreak, involving civil war, mast inevitably have followed. The very contract of the hallows. followed. The very worst passions of the belliger-ents would have been evoked. With the heart of the empire thus convulsed, the limbs would have become paralysed. The prosecution of the war against Russia would have been neglected—the alliance with England might have been severed. The truth is, that the life of Louis Napoleon is at present the most valuable life in existence—more depends on it than any other life. This is less an spinion than a fact."

The London Times thundered in the same strain, commencing its article on the attempted assassination with the exclamation, "On what slender threads hang the destinies of natious!" The position of England, if the Emperor of France should die at this juncture, would be embarrassing and perilous in the extreme. She would have every thing to fear but invasion. Her wooden walls would prevent that In the revolutionary war that would most certainly break out, she would be "out of the ring," at least until after a revolution in her own policy. That she has quaked at the narrow escape of Napoleon, and shuddered at the revelation of the gulf on the brink of which she hangs, and that her solicitude for the safety of the "crowned out-throat who rules over France," is therefore quite accountable.—Cin. Commercial.

Love is the shadow of the morning, which decreases as the day advances. Friendship is the shadow of the evening, which strengthens with the setting sun of life.

We noticed some months since that a portion of a daily edition of the Albany Evening Journal was printed on basswood paper. The entire edition of last Monday's Journal was printed upon paper made entirely from basswood. The paper has a yellowish tinge produced by the use of the city water, which is at present impure, the paper manufactured from filtered water being of pure white. The paper was made by the Messrs. One, of Troy, but the invention of it belongs to Gronge W. vation of order. This is not so. There is BRANDSLEE, of Albany. The Journal says that no possible occasion or pretext for the inter- no end can be attained with cetton and linen rags position of the Federal power, as matters in the manufacture of paper which cannot be now stand. The President has neither legal reached by basswood; whether it be wrapping, news, book, printing or bank-note paper. Mr. B. will commence immediately the manufacture of

By the address of the President of the Know Nothing State Council of New York, we learn that there are now one thousand one hundred and sixty Councils of the order in the State, the number having increased at the rapid rate of two hundred since February first. From the returns not President has no power to adjust them .- yet complete, the President estimates the number of members in the State at one hundred and seventy-eight thousand.
