

Woman.

Barrett, in his poem on "Woman," pays her the following beautiful compliment:

Revered Vandalism.

WASHINGTON, July 26, 1856. On last Sabbath the 4th Presbyterian church was re-dedicated; as it has lately been thoroughly renovated and re-arranged.

As the building was known to contain the pew in which Mr. Adams regularly worshipped; that his name was upon the door; that his Bible, hymn book, and pew furniture were in the same condition he left them;

There is little doubt but that the officiating of this church will, ere long, see that they had effaced one of the brightest ornaments connected with their building, and that eventually they will repent of this heinous act.

With regard to Christ's Church I have a similar incident to relate, which, though it happened some time ago, still humiliates those connected with the transaction.

The pious lived in rude log houses, covered generally, with pieces of timber, about three feet in length and six inches in width, called "shakes," and over the roof instead of shingles.

They passed to their long home; but the hand of time spared the place of their devotions. The interior of the church was modernized, but no scirelions hand touched this memorial of departed piety.

I will not characterize the spirit that suggested and carried out this improvement. I leave that to the country.

them the justice to say, that could they reclaim the staunch old oak of which the pew was built, it would be gladly replaced in its former position.

In this connection let it be remembered that those who are so forward to assert that gawkies are always ready to sacrifice the beautiful to the useful, and all that is grand to the spirit of the almighty dollar—that it is to them, to the chivalry of Virginia America owes her present disgraceful ignorance of the spot where the Father of Li-Country commended with Lia God;

In this same city is another relic of Washington, which should be placed among the proudest remains of our country's glory. It is the flag presented to Washington by the brave Lafayette.

The Early Pioneers of the West. Mr. Ferris, in his book on the great West, thus sketches the character of the pioneers who began to spread themselves throughout the West, between the close of Pontiac's war and the commencement of the American revolution:

The pioneers, living in constant contact with the Indians, necessarily became more than half savages in appearance, habits and manners; and frequently the whole savage character was assumed. Their ordinary dress was too unique to be forgotten. A coonskin cap, with the tail dangling at the back of the neck, and the snout drooping upon the forehead, long buckskin leggings, sewed with a wide, fringed welt, down the outside of the leg; a long, narrow strip of coarse cloth, passing around the hips and between the thighs, was brought up before and behind under the belt, and down lapping as they walked; a loose, deer skin frock, open in front, and lapping once, and a half round the body, was belted at the middle, forming convenient wallets on each side for chunks of hoe cake, tow, jerked venison, screw drivers, and other fixings; and Indian moccasins completed the hunter's apparel.

The pioneers lived in rude log houses, covered generally, with pieces of timber, about three feet in length and six inches in width, called "shakes," and over the roof instead of shingles.

They passed to their long home; but the hand of time spared the place of their devotions. The interior of the church was modernized, but no scirelions hand touched this memorial of departed piety.

But in time the old folks passed away and their children sat in their places. The church was now rich; it had become the most fashionable church in the city; the large choir had given way to the quartette of professional singers; the old English bell, whose rude clang called the first worshippers in Virginia to the house of God, was removed, and one of more musical tone and modern form took its place; and the red brick aisles were carefully covered; and the old reading desk of English oak was replaced by one of more modern structure.

Contemplated Annexation of Turkey to England.—The British journals begin to regard Turkey, as Nicholas did a dozen years ago, as a pie in the moon, whose effects are soon to be appropriated by the people around him, and they are determined to keep their fingers upon the sick man's pulse.

in the minds of the orientals, yet this will be of short duration. Turkey, it says— "is just the country in which England is likely to display her peculiar facilities. A large, rich, neglected territory, with the finest geographical position in the world, commanding the Mediterranean, the ports of Southern Russia, and the Indian Ocean, full of mineral wealth, intersected by great navigable rivers, and inhabited by many millions of Christians, capable and desirous for material progress, is just the country for enterprise and capital.

Let our foreign critics wait a few years and see what nation is taking the lead in Turkey, who will fill the ports of Constantinople and Smyrna with shipping, open up the routes which conduct to the extreme East, join the Danube and the Bosphorus, the Mediterranean and the Euphrates, with railways; send the telegraph through wilds for ages untrodden by civilized man on the frontiers of India, place their steamers on the Mesopotamia, and bring strange races and forgotten regions once more within the limits of civilization.

There is certainly in store for the East a long British occupation, but not of regiments and line of battle ships.— If we have fought and suffered so long merely to prop up such a government as we have described, it may well be said that all is vanity.
