MY LOVER

He came one night, and in its flashing eye, And on his lofty brow, I plundy read A stern resolve enthroned, serone and high— I own I saw it there with scarci dread:

He said that night some barang, trathful words, Spoke of our country's wrongs, disgrace and shame My heart grew heavy as the tale I heard, And saw the blight east on the nation's fame!

Awhile he spoke in gentlor tones to me.
Saying that in all fives some sorrow falls,
Desire and duty cannot off agree,
And then be only said—" our country calls."

"And thou," I said, "another love hust found, Hust let another love my love eclipse!" Then sudden, round me close his arms he wound, And hushed with kisses my upbraiding lips!

"let others take the field! let others go.! Not thou, I cannot give thee up!" I cried; Then in his ear I whispered soft and low— "Which will thou choose—thy country or thy bride?

"Who wilt thou send?" he said; "thy father old, Within whose breast the fires of zeal yet glow? Can be endure the drenching storm, the cold, The march, and battles?" and I answered, "No." "Thou hast a brother, who with eager heart, And bounding pulses longs to most the foe; Can he, a boy, act well a soldier's part — Young, rash, impatient!" and I unsweed, "No."

"Thus hast a friend, who locks three more than life, Next to his country; who, with strength untried, Would do his duty in this time of strife, Hold back by ties that hind him to thy side!

"Be strong, be brave; dispel anworthy fears; Act then the better part, and hid him go: Shall it be said in all the coming years, He holted on idly?" and I answered, "No.

And so he went! We parted 'neath the stars, While the old moon uprose the eastern sky, And faded slowly in the crimson bars That plainty told the hour of dawn was nigh!

Three moons have fided since that parting night;
I daily p ay that God will aid the free,
Will crush the wrong give victory to the right,
And send my dear trend safely bank to me!
