THE LONDON TIMES ON DRY GOODS THE LONDON TIMES ON DRY GOODS CLERKS.—The Thunderer, at whose voice all Britain trembles, steps aside for a moment from the great events of the day and condescends to speak to the poor effeminate simpletons who waste their energies and disgrace their manhood behind the counters of dry goods stores. Its remarks will apply to the clerks of New York as well as London:—
"Whatever a presentable young man"

"Whatever a 'respectable young man,' who smirks behind a Regent street counter, may think or write, we maintain—and the common sense of the country will bear us out in it—that the showing and selling of women's dresses to women is essentially out in it—that the showing and selling of women's dresses to women is essentially a woman's occupation, and that the habit of employing men, whether it arise from the caprice of the customers or the calculation of the shopkeeper, is inconsistent with the dignity of the person who thus devotes himself to an unsuitable occupation. That this is not felt to be the case by the parties concerned, only proves how much use may blant the sensibilities. Many a man who would shrink from making beds, like a foreign hotel waiter, yet spends his life in an essentially feminine occupation, without a thought that there is any thin x undignified in the practice. The 'respectable young men' who serve in drapers' shops may have their own notions of dignity, but for our part we would far rather see any son of ours wielding the saw or the trowel, or even standing side by side with navies on parade, than mincing and bowing and rubbing his hands to 'carriage people' during the best days of an effeminate life."

He appears to be rather ill disposed, and from his appearance, I should judge him to be breechy; there is no fence (lawful or un-awful) that will turn him, for wherever he can find the best range, there he will be likely to be found. His grazing country is growing scarce, and should his owner not make some disposition of him before he gets fikely to be found. His grazing country is growing scarce, and should his owner not unke some disposition of him before he gets too poor, he will not be likely to realize his importation money.

ANOTHER OREGONIAN LOOSE, -A few nights ago, a tall young man from Oregon, was discovered by the San Francisco police in a somewhat questionable place of entertainment on Jackson street, kept by a female who labors under the thrilling title of "Red headed Kate." An officer recognized the young man as a new comer from the land of big vegetables, and accordingly took him in charge. Some loose change, amounting to $720 was found on his person. His meeting with the police before the insinuating people of Red-headed Kate's house had made his nequaintance was a fortunate circumstance.
