Popular Science

The "dew pond" is a curious Stone Age relic yet to be traced in Great Britain. In the absence of springs, broad hollows were scooped out, and these were covered with straw or other non-conducting material, with a thick layer of clay and stones on top. At night the cold surface of the clay condensed an abundance of water for the cattle to drink.

Sympathetic inks, by means of which writings can be concealed when the paper containing them is not subjected to certain external influences, have long been known, but a disappearing paper, the decay of which at the end of a fixed time destroys writing and all, is certainly a novelty. Such a paper, says the French Journal La Papeterie, has recently been invented. It is prepared by steeping in acid, the strength of which is varied according to the lease of life intended to be bestowed upon the paper. After a longer or shorter time the paper disintegrates and falls to pieces. It is suggested that this kind of paper would be a boon to those who do not wish to have their letters indefinitely preserved, but that holders of promissory notes should beware of it.

The fascinating interest of the ancient ruins in Rhodesia, South Africa, drew the attention of the archeologists of the British Association during its recent meeting at Cape Town. Among these ruins the most conspicuous is the great Zimbabwe temple, which lies about 200 miles inland from the Indian Ocean. The oldest of the ruined buildings are believed to date back at least to the days of King Solomon. It is thought that they were constructed by Semitic colonists, whose chief object was gold-mining, and who have left indications of their worship of Baal and Ashtaroth, as described in the Bible. Experts believe that precious metal to the value of three or four hundred million dollars must have been extracted from the gold reefs of Rhodesia in ancient times.

Zapupe is the Indian name of a plant that grows in Mexico, along the Gulf coast. It has within the past year or two attracted considerable attention on account of the apparent commercial value of the fiber derived from it. The natives have long used it for making ropes, cordage, bags, lariats, bridles and fish seines. The plant bears a resemblance to the henequen plant of Yucatan, but is said to yield a greater quantity of fiber. The fiber comes from the leaves, and is white, strong and flexible. The plant is propagated in a peculiar way. A stalk grows up from the center, and the branches which it puts forth become detached and fall to the ground, where they take root. This process occurs when a plant is about 6 years old, but if the leaves are taken off, not until about the 15th year.

What is now known as hypnotism was heralded nearly a half century ago as of great importance in medical diagnosis and as a moral aid in training children, and much greater powers have been assigned to it in recent years. A late French writer has shown that its usefulness has been greatly exaggerated. It affects only wills too weak to be aided, and it can have no value in systematic education. Grassot has concluded that it is so often harmful that it should be employed only by the practised physician. The same authority has found that suggestion may not be expected to cure a purely mental state, nor even a grave and profound nervous state, nor even a profound nervous disease like hysteria, and that its chief value in therapeutics is in localizing nervous disorders, especially hysteria.

COMPARISON OF FRISCO'S FIRE AREA.

The chart shows how much more territory was burned over in San Francisco than in the Chicago fire of 1871 and the Baltimore fire of 1904.

Several years ago there lived in Milltown, N. B., a unique character who always went by the title of "Captain Ab." His greatest peculiarity was that he was always on the opposite side, no matter what the question was. At a town meeting one day, after the chairman had called for the "yeas," which showed the vote was almost unanimous, he called the "contra-minded." John Farnham, one of the citizens, rose and said: "Mr. Chairman, he has just gone out." The "captain" had left the room a moment before. A man who clerks in a cigar store should not smoke a pipe when on duty.
