RAINWATER AND SPRINGS Something About the Nature of Both That Will Be of Interest.

In a recent lecture, Professor Lews, of Lon-don, gave some useful information as to the composition of various waters. Dealing with rainwater, he says as the new-born ministreps fall from the breaking closing, they are practi-cally pure water, containing at most traces of gaseous impurities which the mist has directived from the upper strata of air white journeying in the form of clouds; and where the rain is collected in the country, it yields the nurser form of natural water—healthful to drink, because it is highly serated, free frein all impurity, organic and inorpanic, and delightful to wash in because of its softness and the ease with which the soap gives a lather.

But a very different state of things exists in towns, The rain in falling over towns washed from the air a large proportion of the size-ended organic matters inseparable from a cycles of carbon which incomplete combustion allows to escape from dir chimneys. Charged with these, it still collects more dirt of various kinds from the roofs of our bouses, and finally finds its way into our water butto as a sunjectified sludge. In the passage of the rain putrid sludge. In the passage of the ra-through the air small portlons of carbon is oxide or carbonic acid are dissolved from t-atmosphere, while in showly percolating throu-he surface soil on which it has falled the wai-a brought in contact in the pores of the a-with far larger volumes of this gas, which being constantly generated there by decon-posing vegetation and other organic matter aring this russume through the earth, it has aring this passage inrough the carts, it associated everything that will yield to its own livent action or to the activity of the carbon acide, which, dissolved in water, forms a six carbonic acid, which will dissolve many istances insoluble in the water itself, pring water, therefore, differs greatly from a calculate of the latter is the re rainwater; for, while the latter is rest form of natural water, the forme me river and surface waters.
