

MOUNT HOOD FROM VANCOUVER, WASH.
PHOTO BY L.J. HICKS, PORTLAND, O.

MOUNT HOOD FROM LOST LAKE J.F. FORD, RAINIER, OR.

SUNRISE ON MT. HOOD PHOTO BY J.F. FORD, RAINIER, OR.

St. Helens Rainier Adams

LOOKING NORTH FROM SUMMIT OF HOOD.

THREE SISTERS JEFFERSON SHASTA

LOOKING SOUTH FROM SUMMIT OF HOOD.

J.F. FORD, PHOTO. RAINIER, OR. ROCKS ON NORTH SIDE OF MT. HOOD.

SUNRISE ON MT. HOOD FROM LOST LAKE FROM COPYRIGHT PHOTO BY BENJ A GIFFORD, THE DALLES, OR.

CRATER ROLLS FROM SUMMIT OF HOOD PHOTO BY GEO M WEISTER, PORTLAND

Mount Hood as a noted landmark is plainly seen from a large part of Oregon. No other snow-capped peak of the continent vies with it in attractive features. It is about 60 miles east of Portland and is the first natural feature of great attraction that demands the recognition of all visitors to Oregon's metropolis. The route from Portland to the base of Mount Hood leads through a beautiful and thickly settled section of farming and timbered country. This route offers no obstruction to the easy and cheap construction of a line of electric or steam railroad. The building of this road would afford easy and rapid transit from Portland to Mount Hood—a matter of the greatest importance to Portland's renown and supremacy of the city's best interests. Mount Hood, with its great glaciers, the sylvan retreats at its base, and the grandeur of its higher elevations, will in time become one of the best-known snow-capped mountains of the world.

J.F. FORD, PHOTO. RAINIER, OR. A TUMBLE IN MAKING DESCENT OF MT. HOOD.