Oregon is a long and a rich state of crops. The weather, published on the adjacent pages of this volume will furnish a kind of additional information regarding the magnitude of these crops from Portland, which is the leading port for the great wheat products of the Pacific Northwest. Shipping east from Portland to the coast is a distance of 250 miles and the rich farming lands and orchards of the Willamette, Umpqua, Coquille, Clatsop and Rogue river valleys. East of the Cascades are the hundreds of square miles of rolling plains, with their big farming of both wheat and corn, which yield from 25 to 40 bushels of wheat to the acre. It is the product of these agricultural lands are shipped through Portland. The trees, indigenous and foreign are apples, pears, peaches and the large fruits of the American continent. The fertile areas of Oregon face the world. The best apples are the New York market are from Oregon. The Oregon peach is a better article of export. Eggs are raised in Oregon and are sold in the New York market. There are no strawberries that grow in Oregon. Oregon with its millions of acres and rich soil offers excellent opportunities for the farmer, the industrialist and the business. The harvest is generally good and the weather of the landscape is most excellent.
