WASHING THE FACE.

Directions for Doing It Thoroughly and Scientifically.

Harper's Bazar. The matter of washing the face appears very simple, but it is the exception, rather than the rule, when it is properly done. Look at a place of furniture and note the amount of dust and dirt it will collect in a few hours, and one may realize the quantity the face has to receive. It not only gathers up the minute particles of all kinds that float about the hourse, but that, too, which is outside. There is an old tradition that if one would preserve a delicate complexion, water should not touch the face, the skin water should not touch the face, the sith to be cleaned by rubbing it with a place of flannel, which might suffice if the face were kept in a glass case. The face meeds hot water applied liberally to it with the hunds, and generally the use of pure, non-irritating scap will not come nmiss. Weak cloths are often an abomi-nation, as they are too seldom free from impurities, and the same statement is importance and the same statement is true of sponges. They are left imper-fectly cleanaed from the soap that has been used and are dried at the wash-stand, when after every use they should be washed, boiled and hung in the sir. have often seen faces with mudd; skins, dotted with binckheads and pim-plex because impurities from wash doths and sponges had been rubbed into the skin, to its infection.

If the face is dily and filled with fine blackheads, the latter can be removed by rubiding them with a soft cloth dipped in alcohol or in cenus parts of colopne and water: the latter will cleanse the face better than anything else, acting upon the skin as a gentle stimulant. The con-tact of the fingers with the face seems to have a vivilying effect. It is easy while thus danking the water in the face to massage it and bring the blood to the surface. If, however, the face has not been care fully looked after in the manner de-scribed, if the oily matter has been alto collect in the glands and onlarge their orifices and the face is dotted with those unsightly accumulations, the work of getting rid of them is no easy matter. Some of the largest may be rubbed out with the soft cloth dipped in cologne water, especially if the face is first steamed; but if this method is not sufficient, those remaining must be pressed out one by one using a watch how. The hole of the key is placed over point, a quick pressure is made and contents of the gland pushed out.
