HERE IS SOMETHING GOOD. The Latest Exploit of Yellow Journalism Adequately Treated.

Brooklyn Eagle. When E. L. Godkin left the New York when E. L. Godain left the rew role are evening Post, the Eagle was the only newspaper in Greater New York to pub-lish an editorial upon his retirement. He was a persona non grata in other news-paper offices, and the reasons why, real or supposed, were not hard to find. For years he had alluded to the owner and editor of the New York World as Judas Iscarlot, to him of the Sun as Barabbas, to him of the Tribune as Jeames Yellowplush, to the Times as our Swiss conplush, to the finites us out below the formal of Satan and of irresponsibility, to the Jour-nal as the organ of paganism, and to other sheets with equal freedom, fluency and fragrance. He had said all sorts of things about the Eagle, too, but this paper did not retainate in kind, or sen-tence him to glience in its columns in consequence. The Eagle recognized him to be a man of abilities and disabilities, to his disabilities. So his going out was treated to what we think was a handsome and know was a kindly article, and there is reason to believe that he was there is reason to believe that he was grateful to the extent of his capacity for that attribute. The Eagle also gave to his successors such a fine welcome that one of them was pointedly careful to express his entirely judicial approval Since then, Mr. Godkin has been stricken with illness which should not make him the prey of ghoulish hunters, but which should make him the object of the sympathy of decent men for his suffer-ings and of the respect of strong men for his power, courage and hard work in the past. Instead of that, he has been in the past. Instead of that, he has been made the victim of failse pretenages by the New York Journal, to which he was wont to refer as a pagan sheet, and has now become the game of ribaldry and monkey-ism hy the New York World, which aforeism by the Action as Judas Iscariot. His designations should not be regarded as descriptive. When, he likes persons or things, they are nice. When he dis-agrees with them, they are diabolical. It is a way he has. His epithets are the children of his temperament, and his temperament is the consequence of his mood, his digestion or his circumstances. But as to how he was made the vic in of false pretenses by the New York Journal: In his retirement, somewhere in New England, Mr. Godkin received a letter, the other day. It purported to have been written by a young man ap-proaching the duties of citizenship and desirous of knowing how he should vote. He said that he had long been a stu-dent and admirer of Mr. Godkin and would like to receive, in strict confidence, his advice that he might act upon it. The tone being kindly, the request being com-plimentary and the assurance of privacy and of confidence being explicit, Mr. God-and of connected a reply to the effect which in part follows: "I have a deep-seated prejudice against William McKinley, and the men who curround him and act with him. My opinion, formed long ago, is that they are the most dangerous set of coundable he whole set followed contexts. scoundrels by which any civilized country was ever beset." He further said that this impression was based on facts, which he did not have the evidence at hand to verify, but that he could not rid himself

The next place in which that letter was found, after it left the Postofice, was in the editorial columns of the New York Journal, as if it had been written for that paper and as if Mr. Godkin was a conhappen and as it and goodant way a con-tributor to its columns. The letter to him had been a lure. The writer of the letter was a line. The fact of the lute and the character of the llar must have been equally apparent, but there was nothing in the theft of Mr. Godkin's confidence which disturbed the New York Journal, and there was nothing in the quality of the action which prevented that paper from proudly taking advantage of it. The Eagle's authority for the characterisidion of the action is Mr. Godkin firmself, who has described it in a communication to the Boston Herald.

Ine Hoston Heraid. Since the publication of thut letter, the Journal has had no more to say about it. Its reserve may be to his credit, and can be let go at that. But, unable to claim the feat for its own, the New York World has been dancing in the rear of the Journal's achievement, with the let-ter in its hand and, by devices which are characteristic, it has used the epistic in a way to draw notice from the Journal itself. It has started a query in gram-mar as to whether Mr. Godkin meant that Mr. McKinley is a scoundrel, as well as those who surround him, or as to whether there there are a started as the started star Of course, they are a benighted set in Paris, but when it comes to telephone conveniences they are a trifle in advance Paris, they only are scoundrels, and he is not which entitles him to use any public talephone at any hour of the day or night and for as long a time as it suits his purone. On this question of construction it has sent reporters to various public, semi-public and would-be public persons, and it has asked them their views on the grammar of the matter. It is publishing replies from day to day, and is thus agpose. Every instrument is attached to a desk, has a metal circuit, and is provided with a most convenient receiver and transmitter combined, which enables the replace from any to day, and is thus ag-gravating and continuing the abuse of the-cency, confidence, privacy and personal rights which was involved in the original burglary of a dying man's mind. It is flaunting the proofs of its success, as if user to sit in whatever position he pre-fers and to be free to write when necesit were proud of them and of itself; and we are in no doubt that it is. Whether this is a method to out-Journnize the Journal or of revenge upon Mr. Godkin for his invariable designation of the
