Military Censorship.

In nothing has the war correspondents shown their usefulness for duty more clearly than in their censure of the censorship. They at any rate are not troubled by any foolish notions of discipline, the quality which before all others gives nobility to warfare.

Message through has conferred a benefit for which the gratitude of a lifetime is insufficient.

Once upon a time there was a General who, disliking the censorship, let the correspondents send home what messages they pleased at their own risk. "But," said he, "your dispatches will be telegraphed back to me, and if any offend me I shall put him out of camp."

Feminine Ideals.

Margaret Deland in Harper's Bazar. Are we making the best of it in our own time and the lives of our girls? Or are we, perhaps, in our fury of impatience for goodness and helpfulness, going a little too fast? Can we bear the pace? Can the fabric of society stand the assault of individualism? There seems to be a curious arrogance in our tiny, bustling haste to help the Eternal in improving his world. A strange forgetfulness of the fact that God has drawn the earth along its path among the stars, suns have burned and cooled, nations have lived and died, and human life has drawn nearer and nearer that

To which the whole creation moves without us!

This new feminine ideal, divine as we believe it to be, must yet be bound close to our girlish and womanly duties. In that word lies the vision of a society made up of perfect units, and in it lies also the secret of the joy of life. In it the new ideal and the old ideal meet and behold! we have an ideal which is finer and sweeter and nobler than either the new or old could be alone.
