The Pianola.

The Pianola is a new and unique invention. It is a box of pipes, which play various airs in the same manner as a flute, but without any air being necessary. The box contains a series of pipes, each of which produces a note when struck by a hammer. The movements of the hammer are controlled by an electric motor, which is actuated by a spring. The electric motor is connected with a series of switches, which are controlled by the player of the instrument. The switches are arranged in such a way that the notes are played in the proper order, and the duration of each note is controlled by the length of the switch, which is actuated by the player of the instrument. The Pianola is a very valuable invention, and is likely to be very popular, especially among those who have no time to learn to play the piano, or who are not able to do so. It is a great convenience to those who wish to have music played, and who are not able to afford the hire of a pianist.
