THE ABORIGINES OF CUBA

INDIAN RELICS OBTAINED IN THE QUEEN OF THE ANTILLES.

The Creator of an American Museum Returns With Many Specimens of Pottery.

After a successful visit to Cuba in search of traces of relics of the aboriginal Indian inhabitants of that island, Curator Stewart Culin, of the University Museum, has returned to Philadelphia with a large and valuable collection of specimens. The story of his trip, told in his own words to a Ledger reporter upon his return, is as follows:

"The university has, from time to time, received information that there were wild Indians in Cuba, but this contradicted all the records that the Spaniards had exterminated the race in the 16th century. It was for the purpose of examining into the truth of the reports that my trip was made. I landed at Santiago June 1, and first visited the Indian village of El Caney. I met there an Indian named Almanares, who said he was 112 years old, and I made a number of photographs of him, but found he had no traditions and no highly marked Indian features. I believe he is partly of Spanish descent.

"Thence I went to Guantanamo, going up to Laguetra, 16 miles distant, the best known Indian settlement in the province. The Gulterez Indians here have nothing to distinguish them from rural Cubans, except their physical characteristics. They are small landholders, living in native shacks and huts of palm leaves, and they retain practically no aboriginal customs. These Indians have straight, black hair, high cheek bones, copper colored skin, are disinclined to work, and excel in pig hunting with the machetes.

Domestic Tools and Instruments.

"From Santiago again I went to Baracoa, where a guide was assigned to me by the military commander, and four miles from here I visited the Yara Indians. I collected a small vocabulary of Indian words, and gathered together a few rude musical instruments and domestic appliances used and made by the Indians. Among them was a wooden mortar and pestle, which they employed for pounding coffee and maize, and which is probably aboriginal. The musical instruments are Spanish and negro. Nowhere on the islands did I see Indians of unmixed aboriginal blood.

"Proceeding down the coast I crossed the Yumuri River and went on to Cape Maysi—an extremely arduous trip—my object being to examine the caves used as a burial place by the Indians of former times. Here I was fortunate in procuring a number of skulls, all of the normal, or slightly flattened type. In these caves are found skulls remarkably deformed, which are attributed to marauding Caribs, while native anthropologists assign the normal skulls to the Arawack natives of the islands.

Remains of Old Village.

"From Maysi I made a detour to the Pueblo Viejo—probably the most remarkable Indian monument in Cuba—and I am told I was the first scientific American to visit the place. There is here a rectangular inclosure 600 feet long, built up of gravel piled to a height of 10 feet, closely resembling the mounds of our Central Western states. The earth in the interior of this inclosure is a black mold, filled with fragments of Indian pottery, and I obtained numerous specimens. These alone were well worth the trouble and expense of the entire journey. This site is supposed to have contained an Indian village, and I believe the tradition. It stands on a high bluff overlooking the sea.

"In Havana I had the good fortune to meet Dr. John Guiteras, formerly of the University of Pennsylvania, and he put me into communication with the leading men of science and professors of the University of Havana. Two of these gentlemen, Dr. Carlos La Tore and Dr. Louis Montane, had both been over precisely the route I traveled, and were able to secure for me many invaluable old records and documents touching upon the history of the islands. Dr. La Tore will visit this country in August for the purpose of bringing his institution into more intimate relation to our universities."

Mr. Culin spoke highly at the cordial treatment accorded him by the military authorities, particularly Governor Wood's adjutant, Captain H. L. Scott, who is a man of considerable scientific attainments, and said that he regards his trip as successful in every particular.
