The Pluck of a Woman.
Ladies' Home Journal.
Just fancy a slip of a girl, only 15 years old, promising her dying mother to take charge of the other seven children, and finding that by that promise she had bound herself to see that they were properly educated and cared for. Her father, a country doctor, lived on a lonely farm on the banks of the Cape Fear River, and the girl had, in addition to her inexperience, to contend with the ignorance of the people around her. But she was of gentle birth and had inherited a taste for reading and plenty of books to read—so the battle began. The dead mother's influence was strong. The favor of books was all over the house; their grandfather's handsome library was the one luxury these lone children had in a lonesome old farm. And their sister's influence and these books proved their salvation. She taught them in the daytime, and when night came she studied to keep ahead. And at the same time she attended to the affairs of the household. After four years her father married again and she began to teach a small school near her home. She kept up her studies all the time, and every spare minute was devoted to reading. Finally she saved enough money from the sums she had received from the various little country schools she had taught in to give herself educational advantages that she never could have had otherwise. Then she obtained better positions, and as her salary increased she spent it freely in helping to educate her brothers and sisters.

Today her only living brother is a surgeon in the army—he has charge of a hospital in the Philippines; her sisters are cultivated, educated women, and she—well, if you ask one of President Roosevelt's little boys who his teacher is he will tell you. And if you could see this little lady with her childish figure and soft brown eyes it would be hard for you to realize the right she has made from a lonely farm up to the high position of teaching in the most select school in Washington.

Three Tramps Were Killed.
LOS ANGELES, Cal., July 31.—According to information received at the headquarters of the Santa Fe, the east and west-bound overland limited trains on that road crashed together early today at Melien, a small station 12 miles east of Needles, Cal. It is said that the composite cars and engines of both trains were derailed and smashed, and that three tramps were killed. No report of loss of life among the passengers has been received.
