At daylight yesterday morning, Observer Keiliher, at the North Head weather station saw that the vessel was in a very dangerous position. He notified Astoria, and the tug Wallula, which had towed the Henriette to sea

By one time the Wallula reached the Henriette, she had dropped suchors and was in no immediate danger. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the tug lay near the ship, but no line was passed. as the captain considered it was better to try to work off shore himself than to pay the tug's salvage bill if he was towed off. The vessel was then about three miles north of North Head, and about one and a half miles off

FRESHET WILL HURT ELDER

Nothing Will Be Done on Wreck Until Water Subsides.

No attempt will be made to work on the wrecked steamer Geo, W. Elder until after the high water in the Columbia subsides. Anderson & Crowe, who have submitted the bid to raise the vessel and place her on the drydock, which is now being considered by the underwriters, are indifferent whether their bid is accepted or not. It is hard to say what condition the bull will be in when the water goes down. Examinations made by divers a few days ago showed that the bull was in better condition than had been expected. Though the Bider is nearly 20 years old, not a rivet has been started in her plates. not a rivet has been started in her plates. By the time the river is normal again it may be a different story. Had the rise in the Columbia this year equalled the freshets of many seasons, the Elder would have scarcely a chance to survive the month. It is barely peasible that the bid of the junk dealers' syndicate will be accepted. Captain MacFariane was at Gobe, the scene of the wreck, all day yes-
