Colonel Schebeko's specific offense h said to have consisted in revealing certain plans for raiding French and Russian ter-ritory in time of war by "officers" patrols, which were to ride far into the interior under cover of night and destroy the communications in the rear of the enemy's armies.

Colonel Schebeko was well liked by the Kaiser, but it seems the General Staff long ago suspected him of excessive geal in the performance of his duties. It is realized in Berlin that to spy is the business of every foreign military attache, and German attaches abroad have in-structions of the same kind, but they are told that their activity must be of a dis creet and defensible nature.
