Chew Mock, Columbia Survivor, Hero of Chinatown

Almond-Eyed Oakland Merchant Tells Graphic Story of His Escape From Death in Shipwreck.

HERE was a man in Chinatown last night who was looked upon as a hero by his countrymen. Even the most stolid of that usually expressionless race cast admiring glances at Chew Mock, the only Chinese survivor of the Columbia disaster.

Mr. Chew was bound from his home in Oakland to Astoria to look after some imports for his store in the California city, and with the thrift customary to his race, took passage on the Columbia to save a few dollars on the fare. He is a Chinaman of more than ordinary intelligence, tells a graphic story of the disaster, accompanied by many gestures and exclamations.

"I do not know what the name of the ship was," said Chew Mock. "I go to sleep, wake up, everybody is in a heap of trouble. I do not know what the name of the ship was, but I do know that I have spent remarkably little in doctors' fees. George W. Rugby, 62 N. Clark St., Chicago, Ill., Oct. 25, 1906."
