Insults Woman; Gets Blow on Eye

Husband Punishes Man Who Jostles and Speaks Rudely to Wife on Crowded Street. THE streets were crowded yesterday with Christmas shoppers, and at the corner of Fourth and Washington, about 2:30, there was a jam of people going along both thoroughfares. Following his way up Washington street, a man with a bloodstained handkerchief pressed to his eye made his way through the crowd. The shoppers turned to glance at him, their smiles of holiday expectations suddenly changed to sympathizing concern. The man, with distress plainly depicted on his countenance, pursued his way to the doctor's office he sought. He was plainly dressed, was burly of form, but had not the appearance of a rough character. At the corner other men stopped to talk with a small man who was agitated and who was explaining to the gathering throng that he had done what any man with a particle of manhood would have done under similar circumstances.

"Why," said he, "that loafer insulted my wife while I was momentarily absent. He passed in front of her and jostled her, and when she asked his pardon for being in his way, he turned and said: 'It's a strange thing you--can't keep out of the way.' "I came to her side at that moment and she pointed out the man who had addressed the vile language to her, so I 'soaked' him." The crowd of men applauded the plucky little chap, and just then the patrol wagon dashed up. Just how it happened to come, was a secret, for there was no policeman in the crowd; and, after making inquiry as to the cause of the disturbance, and finding no one able or willing to tell him why the wagon had been summoned, the driver turned his team and trotted off back to the station. The man with the bloody head went on up Washington street and the little man and his wife continued their shopping. THE SAILING Of the Breakwater Postponed. The sailing hour of the steamer Breakwater, for Cook Bay points, has been postponed until tomorrow (Sunday) P. M., December 22, at 8 o'clock, from Oak-street dock.
