WARNS SENATE TO KEEP HANDS OFF

No Changes in Omnibus Public Buildings Bill to Be Tolerated by House.

ECONOMY IS WATCHWORD

Any Attempt to Add to Appropriations Will Mean Death to Measure—Ship Subsidy Bill Is Nightmare to Solons.

OREGONIAN NEWS BUREAU, Washington, April 9.—The tremendous pressure that was brought to bear from all quarters induced the Republican leaders in the House of Representatives to consent to the passage of an omnibus public buildings bill, but in giving their assent, these leaders served notice that the bill must be held down to the lowest possible notch, and must not be loaded down by the Senate, or it will be killed in conference. This means that the House will undertake to push through the bill substantially as it is passed by that body, and will not allow the Senate to double its size by adding numerous provisions for buildings not approved by the House committee.

Such a pronunciamento, of course, means a fight between the two Houses, for the Senate is not inclined to be dictated to by the House, and the House leaders, at the same time, realize the danger of passing a bill of extravagant proportions, for such a bill would deplete the revenues, and give the Democrats an opportunity to cry extravagance in the Fall campaign. On the other hand, if a bill of moderate dimensions is passed, Democrats will be given a fair share of the appropriation, and will, to that extent, be shut off from opposition, for a Congressman, regardless of his politics, likes to go back to the dear people with a present in the form of a public building.

While it is the present purpose to pass an omnibus public buildings bill, the fate of the measure depends upon the action of the Senate, and the Senate, to save the measure, will be obliged to submit to dictation from the lower House. It will be interesting to observe how this fight shapes up. The last round will, of course, not be fought out before the closing days of the session.

The passage of the ship subsidy bill the spines of the Republican leaders in the House of Representatives, for those through the Senate, with very brief discussion, sent a cold chill up and down gentlemen, who regard themselves as the real guardians of the interests of the Republican party, are not anxious to face this issue at the present time, when a Presidential as well as a Congressional election is approaching. There is little doubt that the subsidy bill will pass the House if it is ever brought to a vote, but the question to be decided by the leaders is—shall the bill be allowed to come before the House?

If it does come up and is passed, the Democrats will make the subsidy question an issue in the campaign, and such an issue will not aid the Republican party in the Interior States, which have never been converted to the principles underlying the subsidy proposition.

Tremble at Gompers Name.

Added to this is the fact that Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, has taken a distinct dislike to the subsidy bill, and is threatening to do all manner of things to those Congressmen who go on record in its favor. The very opposition of Gompers is enough to scare many timid members. All in all, the prospects for the ultimate passage of this bill are not as bright as its friends might wish for, though they pretend to believe that the bill will be called up in the House long before adjournment. A great deal—in fact, everything—may depend upon what Speaker Cannon says. Does the Speaker, himself a candidate for President, care to go on record at this time as an advocate of ship subsidy? Mr. Cannon is a very

The Forest Service got many a hard knock in the House of Representatives when the agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration. Few among the Western men stood up for this branch of the Government service; its friends hailed chiefly from states which have no forest reserves. For a time the opposition, headed by Representative Mondell, of Wyoming, held full away and struck out all provisions in the bill increasing the powers and the authority of the service. But the second day of the battle, the friends of the forest service rallied, and the assailants were put to rout.

The truth is that a vast majority of the Western men in the lower branch of Congress, while approving the general principles of forestry, are disgruntled with the way the service is being administered. Some are disgruntled because of the grazing regulations; others believe the Government has been too sweeping in the reservation of timber lands; still others believe that reserves, as now handled, retard settlement or development. But whatever their objection, it is a fact that if the West had the controlling voice in Congress, the forest service would fare badly, for Western representatives, as a rule, think their states have had "too much of a good thing."

Would Abolish Reserves.

There are some among them who would like to abolish all reserves, and throw the Government forests onto the market, but they dare not take this advanced position, in view of the well-known attitude of the President. Others would not go so far, but would materially check the authority of the service and put a stop to further creation of reserves. But while Mr. Roosevelt remains in the White House and stoutly upholds the hand of Mr. Pinchot, the forest service is going to thrive and its policies are going to be enforced. Many a man who hates the forest service is afraid to oppose the President, and it is this very support of the President that makes the forest service so strong.

While there is some talk in Congress of making an appropriation to raise the wreck of the battleship Maine, now resting in the mud of Havana harbor, there is very slight probability that such appropriation will ever be made. It is the opinion of well-informed naval officers that it would be a most unwise thing for the Government to bring that wreckage to the surface. For many experts who examined the battleship at the bottom of the harbor are firmly of the opinion that the explosion which wrecked the ship came from the inside, and not the outside.

Fear an Investigation.

If this should be established beyond all reasonable doubt, it would place the United States in a rather embarrassing position before the world, for the sinking of the Maine was the ostensible cause of our war with Spain, and it was contended at the time that the Maine was sunk by a Spanish mine, which was exploded under the warship. If the explosion was on the inside, the inudications would point to accidental wrecking of the American battleship, for the chances are slight that any Spanish spy could have boarded the ship and ignited any explosive without being detected.

While official reports have always conveyed the impression that it was well established that the Maine was sunk by a torpedo or mine, exploded on the outside, it is nevertheless a fact that the Navy Department has always had its doubts on this question, and it is deemed advisable by naval authorities to permit the wreck to remain buried in the mud, for there it can tell no more tales. There is no desire in Government circles to upset the popular belief.

The Deadly Parlor Match.

Baltimore (Md.) Sun.

"The 'parlor' match burns to death 800 women and children a year in the United States," said State Fire Marshal Lloyd T. MacGill. Continuing, he said:

"This does not include mothers who died from having their clothing ignited while trying to save their burning children. The number of buildings fired by children with matches was 2290, but, comparatively, this seems unimportant. The mortality is greatest in children of 4 years of age. Five-sixths of those who suffered death in this most horrible form were children playing with matches which had been left lying about and the remainder women whose clothing was ignited by glowing sticks or flying match heads.

"The liability of the cottons, from which the clothing of women and children is largely made, to take fire and burn them to death deserves general and serious consideration. A professor in Scotland has found by experiment that flannelette, which is muslin with a nap raised on it, is no more dangerous than ordinary muslin or calico. The easy and effective way to terminate this slaughter of the innocents by roasting is to screen open fires and for women to demand that cotton goods for wearing be fireproofed by manufacturers.

"Perhaps 20 years ago the chemist in Bellevue Medical College Hospital, New York, lost a boy from his pinafore taking fire. The professor, by experiment, found that phosphate of ammonia used to saturate cottons made them permanently fireproof, and he spent years in efforts by lectures and pamphlets to get the New England cotton mills to use it. This fireproofing can be done in the web or after the goods are made up."
