SOME VEGETABLE DISHES THAT WILL PLEASE EYE AND PALATE

Lillian Tingle Furnishes Recipes for Preparing Seasonable Garden Plants in Delicious Ways.

BY LILLIAN TINGLE

SOME time ago, so many months, in fact, that my correspondent may have forgotten her question and must surely think that I have forgotten the answer, I received a letter asking for information about the cooking of vegetables. The writer mentioned particularly asparagus, kohi-rabi and cauliflower, and wanted recipes that would give "something different" in other vegetable dishes. Perhaps there are other housekeepers with similar desires who may be interested in some suggestions, new and old, for dishes in which fresh vegetables play the leading part.

A recent visit to Europe has reminded me and reconvinced me of two things. First, the devotion of the English to cabbage and its relatives. This has, I believe, been before remarked upon, and by several eminent writers, but it is true all the same.

Second, that the most delicious and varied vegetable dishes in the world are to be found in France.

America has fine vegetables, in endless variety; but the average American cook does not make the most of her materials or else she lacks the time, or the skill or the sense of fitness possessed by her French sister.

We might well imitate the French custom of serving a vegetable course— a choice dressed vegetable to be en-### boil the cucumbers before stuffing, and thus shorten considerably the time of cooking.

With a substantial nut or meat filling they make the main dish for luncheon or supper or may be used as an entree. For the filling you use as a basis well seasoned bread crumbs with a little butter or bacon fat for shortening. To this may be added (1) nuts—in which case use very little shortening; or (2) chopped ham; or (3) cold chopped meat with a suspicion of onion juice and mace (4) finely flaked salmon (left over) or chopped shrimps with a dash of lemon juice (5) a little tomato pulp with or without a morsel of finely chopped green pepper. These variations are merely suggestive; probably other good stuffings will occur to you, for a very large variety is possible.

Fried cucumber can be prepared like eggplant, cut in half-inch slices, dipped in egg and seasoned sifted crumbs, and fried in deep, hot fat. Of course they must be carefully drained on paper.

An Italian cook once served to me a dish with a name suggesting a grand opera aria, which I cannot reproduce. The thing itself, however, was a delectable slice of braised filet, with mushroom and brown sauce, and a wreath of fried cucumber, delightful to remember.

Tomatoes are cheap and plentiful just now. You have used them sliced and stuffed, both hot and cold, stewed, and scalloped, and made into soup. Have you tried tomato fritters? Take firm, half-inch slices, dip in well-seasoned frying batter and fry in fat deep enough to cover. Drain well before serving and, if you want to add a foreign touch, sprinkle the fritters with grated Parmesan or other very dry cheese.

In England a standard breakfast ### dish is bacon and broiled tomatoes. It may be just as popular on American tables, but I have not met it so frequently here. The bacon should be the nice, crisp, streaky kind. The tomatoes are cut in half if large or left whole if small. Sometimes they are placed on a broiler, with the bacon above and a pan below, in the oven; sometimes they face a fiery martyrdom in a Dutch oven with bacon slices dangling from hooks above them; sometimes they are simply cooked in the frying pan after the bacon is crisp; but in any case a very simple and savory breakfast or lunch dish is the result, especially when neatly served on well-fitting little rounds of toast, with a sprinkling of finely chopped parsley.

If you have a Southern friend, rather to tell you a good recipe for tomatoes stewed with okra. I have a pleasant remembrance of it, and I think rice or corn was introduced in some way, but I have not a tested recipe for this delicious dish. The small cherry and pear tomatoes that are in just now are useful for dainty salads as well as for preserves. The yellow "egg" or "pear" tomato makes a good preserve in combination with pineapple.
