The Prohibitionists went into the meeting, captured it and then secured the inflorement of their own candidate for Mayor in spite of a two hours' fight on the floor to prevent this action. Mr. McKercher afterward admitted that the job was accomplished as neatly and expeditiously as either the Republican or Democratic party could have done it.

L. D. Mahone read the resolution indorsing Albee, which he supported by a talk setting forth Albee's qualifications. He also read a letter from Mr. Albee, which he said justified the resolution for the reason the candidate inclosed a check for $5 for the Civic Federation Society. Mr. McKercher objected to the resolution and declared that McDaniels was first in the field and represented all the reforms needed in the City of Portland, and was better fitted for Mayor than any of the candidates. He declared that McDaniels had not withdrawn and would not withdraw, and insisted that Mr. McDaniels was the logical candidate for the reform forces of Portland.

This was combatted by speakers for Albee, who charged the Prohibition party with willingness to vote for the dead.

Mrs. Spencer says her husband frequently went on week-end trips with Mrs. N. C. Hogg, sometimes going out horseback riding into the country. When he deserted her February 15, 1908, to take up quarters adjoining those of Mrs. Hogg, says Mrs. Spencer, her husband moved all his personal belongings.

She says that he persuaded her last May to make a visit to his parents in Indiana in order to deprive her of any interest in his property in case a divorce suit should arise. He induced her, she says, to sign in his favor a power of attorney, promising that he would not cell any of their property. But while his wife was away, she says, he sold their interest in the Oregon-Indiana Land Company, besides selling all her personal and real property, greatly mortifying her and causing her to be looked down upon by reighbors and friends.

She also demands $75 a month while the suit is pending, 350 suit money and $500 attorney's fees and $10,000 permanent allmony. Jeffrey & Lennon, Raleigh Trimble and John B. Moon appear as her attorneys.

Six Deaths in May, According to Health Officer Pohl's Report. Measles Also Prevalent.

Scarlet fever is still quite prevalent in Portland, 20 new cases having been re-ported to the City Health Officer since last Saturday, the majority of these being in Stephens' Addition. ness of the public is prolonging the life of the malady.

There are at present 134 cases, as officially given out by attaches of the Health Office, but it is surmised that there are many more cases which have never been made known to the authorities. The fever in numerous instances has been light, and there have been many cases of it where the parents did not realize the nature of the disease, it is said, and allowed their children to run around and endanger others. In this manner many new cases have been created, the public schools furnishing an excellent breeding-place for scarlet fever and measles, and there are three times as many cases of the measles as there are of the fever. There is also some diphtheria, one death having resulted.
