land unequalled in beauty by any city in the country is the style of architecture of the frame residences of moderate cost," said Mr. Rogers at the Portland yesterday.

"In the Eastern cities the wealthy residents, of course, have their beautiful homes, but in the sections built up by persons of moderate means there is row after row of frame structures thrown together presenting an unattractive appearance. In Portland it has delighted me to observe the wide air spaces around the houses and the general adaptation of the bungalow style of architecture. This goes far to make Portland beautiful and healthy."

"I was in Portland last September, and since then I notice there has been a marked advancement in office building structure. Portland has reached the stage when the large office building will be the prevailing type. I have not had an opportunity to inspect any of the newest buildings, but am acquainted with the Wells-Fargo building, which is of the modern type of Eastern building."

Mr. Rogers' magazine, the New Amstel, was founded about one year ago upon the Western plan of presenting in attractive form the advantages and opportunities of the various localities. It takes its title from the old name of New Amstel, given the first Dutch settlement in Delaware.

"I could not see why the Western idea of promoting one's locality could not be utilized in the East," said Mr. Rogers. "We have opportunities there as well as you in the West and we have one advantage that you do not have in being close to the largest commercial center, an opportunity to publish a periodical of literary value as well as to promote the interests of the Delaware peninsula."
