Possibilities for Future Queen of Portugal Narrow Down to Two, One Loves Another and One Has Few Needed Qualities.

LONDON, Nov. 28-(Special.)-King Manuel, of Portugal, who has now left for Paris, the youngest monarch of all Europe, was feted and entertained during his visit in England, and outwardly, at least, everything possible was done to give him a good time. He arrived Mon day, November 15, and when he stepped off the train was cheered to the echo by waiting lines of curious people. This is the first time the young ruler has been in this country, and the people were anxious to see the young chap whom grim tragedy placed violently on a tottering throne. Aside from the curiosity, however, was an undercurrent of sympathy for the boy who at one blow was robbed of his father and brother and forced to take up cares of state for which he was both by nature and training unfitted.

PUZZLING ENGLAND

Enmarried English Princesses are growing scarce, though, and the possibilities of a royal bride are narrowed down to two, Princess Patricia of Connaught, and Princess Alexandra of Battenburg. Of these, the charming "Princess Pat" is generally considered out of the running, for her heart is syowedly given to another, the young Earl Anglesey, and she has been known to say she would never marry out of England. Because of her decided ideas about marriage, the Princess, who is the most beautiful of all England's royal maids, has caused much trouble for her father, the Duke of Connaught, and a decided coldness exists between him and the King. Unmarried English Princesses are grow
