others badly hurt and considerable property damaged was the result of a wreck on the logging railroad at the McDonald Vaughan logging camp of Coos River. A logging train was ditched Coes River. A logging train was ditched and the locomotive boiler exploded. The injured are Don McKay, engineer, and three Greeks, one known as John Allen, who will probably die.

The railroad runs from the camp in the mountains down to Coos Bay. A trainload of logs was being brought down, when the brakes would not work and the engine got out of the control of the engineer. McKay stayed at his post, however, while the train dashed wildly down the hill. When the en-gine left the track McKay jumped, thus saving his life, but receiving bad bruises. George Snyder, the fireman, also saved his life by jumping.

Three Greek section hands were working at the foot of the hill. They thought they were out of the way of the train, but when it jumped the track they were covered by the wreckage and the explesion of the boiler caused them all to be badly scalded. The Greeks and McKay were taken to Mercy Hospital at North Bend. The locomotive, cars and logs were piled up and badly damaged.
