more queries than she has been asked by all who have come in contact with her since her arrest. She was made to recite the history of her life from childhood and was interrupted fre-quently by some one of her hearers who wanted further information.

At first she refused to talk, but Matron Freely, who has been keeping a watchful eye over her, whispered to her to tell them and have it over with. Miss Carver then faced them and told all, she declared, she knew. She made a deep impression and when she had finished, the verdict in a chorns of feminine voices was "not guilty."

Dramatically she explained her trou bles and her cares and the glimmer of light and hope that Edge had brought into her life. Edge, she said, had "proved a good friend." She declared the Rilling was accidental and rethe killing was accidental and re-
