ber of guards, nobles, slaves and oth-ers, which the spectacular character of the play require, the latest offering of the Baker Stock Company represents one of the most ambitious undertakngs seen in stock in this city in a long

The play deals with the persecution of the early Christians, when the ideal standards of the little-known faith were in conflict with the gross immerality that prevailed in the highest cir-cles of the city. Mercia, a beautiful convert, who has been discovered in convert, who has been discovered in the band of Christians, becomes the prey of Marcus Superbus. Prefect of Rome: Tillegenus, Lucinius, Philodemus, unscrupulous nobles, who strive to win her. Marcus Superbus becomes so enamored of the young woman that on several occasions he saves her life from the other evil noblemen. Marcus, however, wishes only to win her for his mistress. When his aim seems to be all but accompilated, the Christian girl calls to heaven for protection. On the wall behind her appears a flaming cross. Marcus spares her. Through his jealous mistress the fact of his shielding one of the hated Christians comes to the ears of Nero, who orders him to deliver the girl up to the lions unless she will renounce her faith. In the last act Marcus, now more and the last act Marcus, now more and nartyrs to feed the lions for the Em-

Willard Mack, as Marcus Superbus gives a fine portrayal of the young Ro-man noble. Maude Long, as Mercia, the persecuted Christian girl, gives charm to this pathetic character. Ruth Lechler, as Stephanus, a young Christian, who is called upon to betray his friends, showed much emotional power. Richard Vivien gives reality to the character of the monster, Nero. Marie Baker was excellent as Berenia, Mar-cus Superba's jealous mistress. Fanwas Dacia, an cratic Roman matron. Walter B. Gli-bert furnished what little comedy the play contains, with his impersonation of a jolly old inebriate. The other characters were all well sustained. The scenes showing a Roman mob and a company of merrymakers were both well managed. The costumes were rich and varied and the stage pictures un-usually handsome. The scenes showing portions of the houses of Marcus, Berethe palace of Nero, and a grove near Rome gave opportunity for elaborate stage settings.
