GOLD HILL, Or., Aug. 4.—(Special.)— An onion that is said to be the best adapted to culture in Southern Oregon of any variety yet found has been developed by Louis Sivers, a farmer living in the Evans Creek district. By crossing two standard varieties, both of which were first proved to do well in this soil and climate, Mr. Sivers has produced a sweet, mild-flavored onion that combines the good qualities of the parent stocks, is easier of cultivation and yields better than either. He finds that his onion thrives best when sown early, with shallow but constant cultivation and plenty of room in the TILLAMOOK, Or., Aug. 4.—(Special.)—Fletch Wilson is exhibiting a stalk of rhubarb which was grown on his Kelchis River bottom land, three miles north of this city. Mr. Wilson was starting after the cows in the morning when he noticed the large leaf, and, as it was raining, he pulled it and used it for an umbrella.

On taking it to the house his attention was called to an article in daily papers about a man at Cottage Grove who raised a rhubarb leaf two feet six inches across. Mr. Wilson's leaf was three feet six inches across the top. The stalk was 20 ½ inches long and 5½ inches in circumference and weighed two pounds and 15 ounces.

Mr. Wilson thinks that the Tillamook vegetable cannot be surpassed. He also had a head of lettuce that was 17 inches across and weighed three pounds.
