Down on the lower East Side there are numerous shops in which appear the radiant figures of brides in full regalia, many of them accompanied by bridegrooms also ciad in the somberly festive garments in which a man becomes a benedict. Brides or bridegrooms glad rags can be hired for very small sums—so much for the wedding ceremony. It is a comfortable and economical method of procedure. The world in general does not suppose that practices of the kind obtain on the upper east side, but they do.

Those beautiful lace vells do not belong to the brides who wear them, the dressmaker in a moment of confidence, confided to her customer. There were not also the confidence of the family goes with them.

But it is not everywhere that a fine lace vell could be found at short notice. The best department atores do not keep on hand quantities of the finest old lace. The demand is necessarily small and the laces too valuable to have much money fied up in them. They are also perishable, subject to wear and theft.

A woman who keeps about as many fine laces as there are to be found in one shop knows to her sorrow that there are lace thieves. A handsomely dressed woman who drove up to her shop in an automobile and some of the finest and most expensive laces one day. She wished the best and looked at several pleces. The European Ambassadors in London have been considering the situation since that time, but have not reached any definite conclusions. The fall of the fortress of Adrianople is considered likely to have some influence on future negotiations.
