The year, 1913, has emphasized that the Northwest has some wonderful backfield material.

Hap Miller, of Washington, weighing over 200 pounds and a powerful and strong runner, easily dominates the field. Miller is worthy of mention in any All American convenience.

field. Miller is worthy of mention in any All-American symposium. Parsons of Oregon, by virtue or his sensational open field running, both in the Oregon Aggies game and the Washington melee, in which latter he scored Oregon's touchdown, gives him second count. He is a better defensive player than Miller and a remarkable athlete. Lockhart of Idaho, Blackwell of the Oregon Aggies, Jacquot of Washington, Coulter of Washington State and Everett May of the Oregon Aggies are other classy halfbacks of the season. May would have made the honorary tackle list had he been kept there all Fall, but he did wonderful work for Dr. Stewart when shifted back.

Laythe likely will be ignored by most of the critics, because he is not a flashy sort of lineman, but, after officiating in three games behind Laythe, the writer is much impressed with his solidarity and his buildog method of beating down the opposition.
