Miss Valentine Prichard, of the People's Institute, is arranging for a big Christmas tree and party at which about 400 children will be entertained at Trinity parish house on December 20. To make every one of these little folks happy there must be 400 red stockings for Santa to distribute, and the stockings must be full. At present there is only enough to fill 250.

Who will help with the remainder? Must some of the children be turned away disappointed? These are the questions that are worrying the committee. The children who will attend this tree will come from the poorest homes. This annual festivity means much to them and Miss Prichard and her helpers are working diligently to make the day the happiest of the year for their little guests.

Readers of Dickens, and particularly those who love the great author's favorite book. "David Copperfield," will be entertained and edified in seeing the pictured version of that story recently produced by the Hepworth Company of London, and now being marketed in America by Albert Blinkhorn. American companies have given us, in a small way, some excellent motion pictures dealing with the life of David Copperfield, but these have been brief character studies in the main, not attempting to cover the entire story. The Hepworth picture is in seven parts, beginning with the childhood life of David at the Rookery, Blunderstone, and depicting the more important incidents up to the time of his marriage with Agnes terminating with the Yuletide dinner. It would be quite impossible to put into any single production all of the little comedies and tragedies included within the covers of the famous story. The wonder is that the Hepworth people have been so successful in separating the events in which David was most concerned and clothing them with so much interest. Rare discrimination has been exercised in the choice of events so that we have been given a story in pletures that holds together and does not tax the imagination of the observer or require a profound knowledge of the story itself in order to obtain the full-(From the Moving-Picture World.)

pictures that holds together and does not tax the imagination of the observer or require a profound knowledge of the story itself in order to obtain the full-est enjoyment from the seeing of it.

Much of the beauty of this picture lies in the scenes of Old England. Hepworths have gone to the actual places of which the story tells and given us views of Canterbury, the cliffs of Dover, and street scenes that have not materially changed in the past hundred years. The beach at Yarmouth and the home of Peggotty and Ham and little Emily, referred to so frequently and lovingly by David, is reproduced in a gratifying manner. The locale of this production throughout was carefully chosen, and gives educational value to the picture that will make it most desirable for school use, for few schools these days do not include a critical study of this famous story of Dickens in the course of English literature.

Considered from a purely mechanical point of view it would be difficult to
