The news of the explosion brought excited crowds to the hospital, where many harrowing scenes were witnessed. Wives or relatives hysterically asked the fates of their husbands or loved ones, while the single woman whose husband had been killed could hardly be reconciled when the news of his death was broken to her.

This woman was Mrs. Kendler, who, like the others, rushed to the hospital at Big Eddy and demanded news of her husband. Not one of the large crowd of workmen had the heart to tell the woman her husband had been ground into hundreds of pieces. It was heart-rending to see the big bronzed workmen shrinking before the questions of the woman, none having the courage to tell her of his frightful death. Other shovel men, mates of the dead man, turned away from Mrs. Kendler with tears streaming down their faces. Kendler was the only one among the dead men who had a family in this country. It is believed Lind had a wifes in Sweden. Besides the widow, two children survive Kendler.

The dead boddles were brought to The Dalles tonight for the Coroner's inquest tomorrow.
