"The Great Light Way"

"The Great Light Way," or Third Street, as it was formerly known, is planted with giant steel double arches, which measure across every street intersection from Yamhill street to Burnside street. These arches weigh nearly five tons and span a full 82 feet. There are ten of them, each set with a 750-watt bulb at the apex of the arch and with 200 40-watt globes along its arms. In all, over 87,000 watts of electric energy are consumed in an hour while the full current is turned on. It took two weeks of hard work to erect the arches. And mightily risky work it was, too, because of the proximity of the wires and trolleys. Insurance protection on the work cost 16 1/4 per cent of the pay roll. But the job was put through without injury or interruption and "The Great Light Way," which we now have, stands as a fitting reward for the labor and money expended.
