WHAT ANNE RITTENHOUSE SAYS. Warlike Styles With Braids and Buttons. PARIS, Aug. 10.—The present warlike styles may bring about warlike like August, as wars of the past have almost always done.

Of course, in the days when might was the only method of establishing right, women doubtless got so in the habit of hearing of warfare that they were not excited by it. But for the last century or two women's fashions have reflected the excitement that war has invariably caused.

meats, but do not let it brown. Now add a small quantity of onions chopped coarsely. Cook this mixture until it smokes and burns a little. Now add a cup of water and cook until it is like a thick map. Strain through cheesecloth and pour into a bottle. It will keep several months, and will color and flavor soups and sauces.

THE LANDMAN STORY FOR TONIGHT BY Mrs. F. A. WALKER.

Billy Pig was sent to market one morning by his mother. "I want you to bring home a nice fat duck," she said, "and don't you stop to sleep or talk to Billy Goat on the way. Go straight to the market and right straight back."

Trick Billy Pig starts in a dark color. Add half a cup of water and a pinch of salt. Let it boil a few minutes and when cold bottle. This will keep for some time, whether on a plate, or in a bottle.

The duck was on top and Billy was hurrying through the woods when he heard someone calling his name. He looked around, and, coming down another path was Mr. Fox. "Good morning, Billy Pig," he said. "You look very fit in your white suit and your red cap."

Billy Pig did not reply, for he intended to mind his mother's words and go straight to the market. He walked past Mr. Fox. Mr. Fox, however, had no intention of being left in this manner, so he said: "Wait a minute, Billy Pig. I want to see your red cap. I am thinking of getting one. Why, what in the world are you doing with that spotted duck?" he said, as though he had noticed it.

"What is the matter with it?" asked Billy Pig, taking the duck from the basket and looking at it. "I do not see anything the matter with it. It is a large duck, it is expensive the year round, but where the price rises in winter the housewife may prepare it while it is cheap. Spread on a board in a moderate oven and when thoroughly dried rub the leaves to a powder in a mortar. Press them through a fine sieve, pour into a wide-mouthed bottle, cork securely and keep in a dry, cold place.

May leaves can be bought at grocery stores, but they come more cheaply at the drug store. A dime's worth will last a family of ordinary size an entire winter. They should also be kept in an air-tight receptacle, free from dust and in a cool place.

A good mixed herb flavoring, which is invaluable in the preparation of cheap meat dishes is this: One tablespoonful of dried marjoram, two tablespoonfuls of dried parsley, one of celery seed and one of dried lemon peel. Rub these together through a fine sieve and bottle.

Dried tarragon leaves in vinegar form the tarragon vinegar which gives such a piquant flavor to sour sauces. A bottle of capers, which are covered with vinegar, should be in every pantry. They are delicious in both sauces for fish and dressings for salads.

Garlic should be used with discretion in making salad dressing. The bowl of the spoon with which the salad is mixed is rubbed with a clove of garlic, peeled and split; the actual garlic is never used.

Mushroom, walnut and tomato catsup, and celery salt can be bought at all first-class grocery stores, and prove invaluable in preparing meat dishes. Burnt onion sauce should always be kept at hand for use in preparing soups and cheap meat dishes. It is made as follows: Four rounded tablespoonfuls of sugar are placed in an iron saucepan over a brisk fire. Stir it until it and shelter. And if this is the only meaning of home they take with them, when they go forth to their work in the world, they are not going to be as well fitted for the tasks and responsibilities as they should be.

They not only need to know love, but they need to be taught to appreciate it. Looking on water all one's life will not teach one to swim. Many children grow up altogether unappreciative of the love of parents and of that of brothers and sisters.

The home atmosphere should be full of the inspiration that urges every one of the family to do his best. Each child should feel that no matter where he is, whether at school or at play, father and mother and everyone else of the family are expecting him always to do his best. And he should not only feel that, but he should be taught to think for himself, what this best is.

The problem of making a real home in this sense is far bigger than the making of the home that provides food and shelter. Both are included in the making of a home, but this part of the work is the larger, more important, farther reaching. It stretches out in time, an ever-renewing summer of ways. Those who have undertaken the making of a home have a big task. But it is a task worthy of the best of a man.

Marlan, for many months now, had been gloriously unconscious of the depletion of his bank account by means of which he had led the Cliff Dweller's editor to accept and pay for his manuscripts, thus, in effect, supporting her with his own funds ever since his departure for home and then for the other side of the sea.

Had Marlan known anything about the real facts she would never have subscribed. Her own purse would have risen in wrath against such a philanthropic procedure.

One day, while Chaloner was attending to some business correspondence, Marlan wandered upon the broad veranda of one of the palatial boardwalk hotels. She dropped into a chair and began studying the types printed about her.

Nearby was seated a woman idly fingering the leaves of a magazine. With her was another woman, her eyes also on the pages of the other's magazine. The magazine, Marlan observed, was the Cliff Dweller. She had one of her stories in it. She wondered if the two women would pause at hers. They did so in a few minutes, and Marlan was utterly unprepared for the denouement destined to take place.

"There's a rather interesting story connected with this Winthrop person's success in breaking into the magazine," said the one.

Marlan caught her breath sharply, and leaned forward cautiously to listen, hardly able to restrain a gasp of astonishment.

"It seems that some man is struck on this girl, and that he arranged with the publishers to pay a certain amount of her stuff at his expense, have it rewritten, and publish it in order to encourage her."

SPADSHOTS BY BARBARA BOYD. Making Real Homes.

SO EMINENT a person as the Vice-President of the United States has said that we have not enough real homes in this country. And an authority on social conditions says that the home in America is shattered to its foundation.

Those of us who have comfortable, elegant homes and there seem to be quite a number so situated—look somewhat indifferently upon these statements, or if we do give them any thought, are rather apt to consider them extreme. But the prominence of the persons voicing them, and their ability, because of their position and experience, to see rather comprehensively, lend a value to what they say that makes it worthy of at least some thoughtful consideration.

Some of us, it must be confessed, are quite content to give our family good food and a clean house. If we keep the bills within the prescribed limits, if the washing and ironing and mending are duly done, if the atmosphere of the home is on the whole cheery and pleasant. Occasionally we may chide Willie's table manners or scold little Alice for leaving her playthings scattered around. Others of us do not even keep up to this standard. Expenses run away with us. The food is not well cooked. The house is often in confusion, slippers and pierces his foot. Lum Hop's babble over the injury aroused the owner of the woodpile.
