Mignon Ellot at the home of her mother, Mrs. W. A. Ellot, for the mem-hers of her class in the Portland Art Association. Each guest was attired to represent either one of the famous masterpleces or an eminent artist, The affair was decidedly unique and artistic to a fine point, the daintily garbed women, with their colorful costumes, looked as if they had really stepped from a huge frame. Every detail was carefully planned and carried out, and the art students not only enjoyed a delightful evening, but had an opportunity of observing line and coloring. Dancing was the feature of the evening, and later a delicious collation was served, the hostess being assisted by a number of charming girls.

This applies equally well to the girl in love. Often I get letters asking advice about marrying a certain man. And the writer will fairly beg me to coincide with her personal desire.

I do believe that no adviser can or ought to be allowed to decide finally in any question involving marriage. Every girl should make her own decision. To force upon her one who is renugnant or girl should make her own decision. To force upon her one who is repugnant or whom she does not love is a flagrant wrong which involves disaster. In her own individual interest and in that of her sex every woman should repulse and resent every attempt to override her judgment.

But to take counsel with those who But to take counsel with those who are fitted to give it either because they are older and have more experience or have adequate knowledge of the facts of the case, is most advisable. No girl with average common sense but must know that many young women have taken false steps just because they have refused to seek advice or because they have ignored advice when it was sought and given.

Every circle, however small, yields sad illustrations. We call them unfortunate marriages. They are often simply ill-advised unions from which timely counsel would have saved both

THE baker's wagon drove slowly along the village street, the baker musically announcing his advent by a ringing bugle call. Other bakers of the town put bells on their horses or biew unmusical blasts upon ordinary tin horns. But this baker had a very shining brass bugle and he woke the stillness of the village street with it in a way to bring the villagers with beaming faces to his wagon.

He was a large, broad-shouldered man with a good-natured face, a beaming smile, a jolly word for everybedy. Probably it was his smile as much as probably it was his smile as much as his the favorite would serve his route during his ab The substitute was a small, wixened, parchment-skinned man with a sour, distrustful eye and a mouth that looked parchment-skinned man with a distrustful eye and a mouth that looked as if it never knew a smile. But whether because he saw the good effects of geniality or had been admonished by the baker that it was a quality worth while, he was endeavoring to imitate the man he was to succeed. He compelled himself to smile and to say with an effort at pleasantness that he would try to suit them. The next morning the slow, melancholy ringing of a bell called the people to their doors. The baker's substitute was parading up and down the street, solemnly ringing the bell and calling in a nasal, raucous voice that set one's nerves on edge, "Here's the baker. Here's the baker. Here's the baker. Here's the baker. Here's the baker, here's the baker. Here's the baker, here's the baker."

A woman came out as was her custom to inspect his wares.

"Well, mother, want some bread?" he asked.

"I'm not your mother," she tartly rejoined.

"Well, you're old enough to be," he said with a little cackle, evidently thinking this a fine style of joke.

The we han's eyes snapped. "I don't want any bread this morning," she said, turned on her heels and went in, stamming the door.

"Guess she's got a temper," he genially announced to a waiting customer. Then his conversational efforts expanding, he explained in a tone in which one tells a child about the multiplication table, "This is good, fresh bread."

"De you suppose I'd be buying stale bread."

"Do you suppose I'd be buying stale bread." rejoined this customer, somewhat sharply as she turned away.
His face became sour. "They're a cranky lot of people." he remarked to the next customer. And as he sat and waited some minutes before another haves to see if its occupants would house to see if its occupants would come out for anything, he was heard to remark, "If I drive on, I suppose they'll be mad. mext block and announcing in the same harsh voice, "Here's the baker."

"I'll be glad when the other man comes back," one of the neighbors remarked to another, a few days later. "This fellow nearly drives me creay."

As for the substitute, his opinion is that his customers are all cranks and that there is no pleasing them, and he'll be glad when he gets rid of the job. He doesn't see how the other man can stand it.

Pethaps some time he'll learn that gentality is not a matter of putting on a smile or a light jesting tone. Electric light through yellow glass isn't sunshine. A kindy interest in people and a desire to serve them has to be genuine, a real part of himself, if it is to win an equally kindly regard from them. While a man is at heart grouchy and fault-finding he will not impress people as being genial and kindly. In spite of one's efforts, the outer self will in the long run faithfully picture forth what dwells within.
