Clubmen are all astir over the Maxilians' jolly big "1915" party that is to take place this evening at Cottill Hall. The best musical talent, banjo quintet and the Gerstal and Wylie entertainers to furnish a variety of pleasure for the evening, this party will be an unusually jolly one.

SNAPSHOTS

By BARBARA BOYD

The Thoughtless.
The boy came rushing into the kitchen, where the sister was preparing the noonday meal. The mother was sick and upon the daughter of the house had devolved the housekeeping tasks.

She was somewhat new at the work and a bit hurried and worried, for father would be home in a few minutes for dinner.

"Oh, sis," exclaimed the boy as he banged in, "all the fellows are going to have lunch out on the lot. Can't I take mine out there to eat it?"

"Alice, wasn't that a thoughtless 'no'?" You have taken the sunshine out of Joe's day by not pausing to think whether you could grant his request or not."

"But I haven't time now to put up a lunch for him," objected Alice. "Father doesn't have much time for his dinner and it has to be ready for him when he comes."

"That is true enough," replied the aunt. "But you might have put up a lunch later. But that is not the point; it is thoughtlessly saying 'no.' If at the time he proposed it, she could give it consideration, instead of flitting it down, she has given the answer that has soothed instead of irritated. The children have come to know that if mother can do the thing they want done she will. And so they wait with confidence for her decision. There is no sharp, unconsidered 'No, you can't,' to be changed after much wheedling and coaxing on the children's part to 'Yes, you can,' a process

THE SANDMAN STORY FOR TO-NIGHT

By Mrs. F. A. Walker.

Hester and Her Gold.
ONCE upon a time there lived a woman who had two daughters, Jane, her own daughter, and Hester, her stepdaughter. Jane would never hear many times; but Hester was a good girl and helped her stepmother and never said unkind things.

They were very poor, and one day Hester was working in the garden, wondering if the vegetables would grow and keep them from starving, when she saw something shining in the earth.

She picked it up and found it was a piece of gold. She pushed aside the earth and found another piece; she hurried into the house to show her good luck to her stepmother and sister.

"Where did you find it?" asked Jane. "In the garden and dug around the vegetables, spoiling some of them in her eagerness to find the gold, but she did not find it, and she came back to the house feeling very cross.

"You should give me one piece," she told Hester. "The garden belongs to me as much as to you."

"I shall spend it as for food," Hester replied, "and you will receive as much as anyone."

But Jane was not satisfied. She wanted the gold; and so Hester gave her one of the pieces.

The next morning Jane said: "I am going to the city to buy a silk gown." "You are a selfish girl," said Hester, "and you have given up half of what she found, and will spend the rest for food, and you are going to the city to spend your gold for a dress for yourself."

"I am tired of living here," replied Jane, "and I am going to buy a silk gown and live in the city, and she will be glad to see you without saying 'goodbye' to her mother or Hester. She had walked along only a short distance when she met an old beggar woman.

"Please help me," said the beggar. "I am faint with hunger."

"I cannot help you," replied Jane. "I am on my way to the city to buy a silk gown, and I cannot be bothered with beggars."

mother she was going to the next town to buy food, and I will bring you a new cap, too," she said.

"You are a good girl," said her stepmother. "You are kinder to me than my own daughter."

Hester kissed her stepmother and went down the road. On the way she met the same beggar that Jane had refused to help.

"Please help me," said the old beggar. "I am faint and must have food."

"I have no food to give you," said Hester, "but I will give you a drink of cool water from the well yonder, and you wait until I return from town I will bring you food."

The old lady was glad to have the water, and said she would wait until Hester returned from town.

Hester hurried away, and bought the food and the cap for her stepmother, and when she returned there was the old beggar waiting for her.

"Hester gave her a loaf of bread. 'You can take it home with you, and here is an apple and some meal,' said Hester."

And then the strangest thing happened. As she handed the bread to Hester, she heard a voice say: "You are a good girl," said the old woman; "you shared your gold with your selfish stepmother and you helped a stranger, and best of all you are kind to your stepmother, who is fond of you. When you reach home, do not be surprised at anything that happens, for I am your fairy godmother, and I have buried the gold for you to find."

Hester thanked her for all the good luck that had come to her, and drove home, and when she took the things from the wagon there was so much that part had to be stored in the barn. And instead of one cap for her stepmother, there were two. Hester's stepmother wondered how one piece of gold could purchase so much, and Hester told her about the fairy godmother.

The next day Jane returned from the city without the silk gown. "My gold was stolen from me, and I am tired and hungry," she said. "I deserve to be helped," said her mother; "you were so selfish; but if you are willing to do your share of the work and help Hester, if she is willing, you may stay."

Hester was quite willing to have Jane, and Jane was so ashamed of the way she had behaved in the past that she did more than her share of the work, and showed in many ways that she had repented of the selfish manner in which she had treated her mother and Hester.
