Other bombs fell in the Rus des Dames and the Rue du Long, but none of the residents was hurt.

The first bombs began to drop on the outskirts of Parls at 1:45 and the last at 2:25 o'clock. At 4:30 o'clock the firemen went through the streets trumpeting the signal that all danger was passed and the lights of the city were turned on.

The Zeppelins traveled at a great height, estimated at considerably more than a mile. This and the light haze in the upper air levels enabled the raiders to escape.

"The hall throbs with cries, groans and shrieks of pain, rising some times to a crescendo that the strongest nerves cannot endure.

"We have seen none of the glory of the soldler, and the civil population, too. But I am sure no glory can compensate for all this. To see the refugee children and the wounded men and the suffering women is worse than any nightmare genius could dream.

Continuous Fire Is kept Up.

Parisians, during the attack, were unable to distinguish between the defenses for three-quarters of an hour. The boulevards and open places of the city were crowded. Half a hundred bombs, it is estimated, were dropped on Paris and surrounding villages and towns. Some were explosive and others are said to have been filled with inflammable liquids. Three fires blazed up in the wake of the aircraft, but were quickly extinguished.

A sentinel in Complegene, 60 miles morth of Paris, caught the first slimpse of the Zeppelins at 12.45 in the morning. Within five minutes every post in entrenched Paris had been notified by military telephone of the coming attack.
