WO charming affairs were given yesterday afternoon, and the per fect weather undoubtedly was re sponsible for the large and fashionable gatherings at the home of Mrs. W. D. Wheelwright and Mrs. H. C. Wortman, the former complimenting her house guest. Miss Sullivan, with a lovely tea, and the latter honoring Miss Mande Batcham, flances of Fielding McClaine,

The rooms were a bower of Spring flowers arranged most artistically, and the gowns of the women assisting and the hostess and her guest were the incarnation of Spring.

The tea table was adorned with a charming arrangement of tiny yellow, fluffy blossoms, combined with purpletoned daisies, and about the room were huge bowls of doronicum and rhododendron. The garden, into which the drawing-room and dining-room epened, lured many of the guests out, who admired the masses of heautiful blossoms and shrubs abloom. One of the most interesting guests of the afternoon, around whom the maids and matrons flocked, was dainty little Mrs. Bengo Mitsul, who was charming in a lovely Japanese court robe.

Ices were served in the drawing-room, Mrs. W. C. Alvord and Mrs. Charles F. Beebe presiding at the table. Serving tea and coffee from 4 to 5 o'clock were Mrs. Robert W. Lewis, Miss Mary F. Failing, Mrs. Frank Edward Hart and Mrs. W. D. Washburn, of Minneapolis.

Mrs. Wortman's guests included the younger set, with a few of the younger married women. The drawing-rooms and reception halls were aglow with huge sprays of fragrant apple blossoms and pink Japanese cherry blossoms making an effective foil for the emart tallleurs and frocks of the guests and assistants. The dining-room was adorned with quantities of the lovely wild erythronium and maidenhair ferns.

REGON DAY" at the Portland Woman's Club was an ideal day. Sunshine and lovely Spring weather seemed made to order for the day that was dedicated to the state. Within the clubrooms Scotch broom, dogwood and ferns carried out the general idea of flowers and Springtime. William Finley brought the birds of the wildwood to the clubrooms in a fine set of pictures, showing the feathered creatures in their native haunts. His talk was interesting and instructive. C. C. Chapman introduced stereopticon pictures of the places of scenic grandeur in Oregon and told of the beauty of sees nothing but the stone; another a fescinating and wonderful world in process of development.

So is it not true that the world wa live in is, after all, the world of mind One person rees a pretty flower by the wayside to be picked and fastened to her dress or carried home and placed in a vase. Another sees the same flower, but in addition to its beauty, she sees a marvelous realm of cell structure, of chemical action and reaction, of the life-force working a miracle before her eyes from timest root to the tip of every exquisitaly colored and perfumed petal. She knows the processes that are going on in that flower, the growth, expansion, reproduction. And the world she is looking upon in that flower is bigger, more interesting than the one the other woman sees, because her mental outlook is different. To the physical eye, the flowers are the same to both women. But one dwells in a mental world connected with it of which the other knows nothing.

If then the real world we live in is nected with it of which the other knows nothing.

If then the real world we live in is mental, and it lies with us to make this world, why not have it just as vast and beautiful as we can? No one compels us to limit it. No one rules our kingdom of mind but ourselves. It remains with us whether our world contains but a stone or whether it is a wonderful picture of creation; whether we are but a cog in seme dull, menotonous work or in touch with the energies of mankind in production and distribution; whether our world is limited to a flower nedding on a stalk, or whether it is a world of life-force in marvelous growth and expansion.

It is ours to make of the physical environment about us the real world in which we live. This is the world of mind or spirit, and happily, no one is ruler there but ourselves.

Who own the most beautiful residences in Portland?

From the standpoint of an artist this question will be answered in Country Life in America by Henry H. Saylor, of New York, the editor, who arrived in Portland from California Thursday and departed the same night for Seattle.

Mr. Saylor was at the Portland Hotel during his brief visit, but was shown over the city by W. G. Wolford, an architect, who also entertained Mr. Saylor at a dinner party at the University Club.

"The tour I am making is to discover the most artistic homes in the United States," said Mr. Saylor, last night, "I have not selected a residence because of the outlay of money, but how the money has been spent. The architecture, grounds and placement are considered.

out among the bushes. She marveled at its size and likened it to a bear hiding in the underbrush. A man of the party who was something of a geologist began to tell the nature of the rock, how it probably came to be in that position, what the markings of it meant. He unrelled to his hearers the past ages of the world and pictured of the past ages of the world and pictured the surface of the earth swept by fire and ice and flood.

To the child, the rock was but a big stope somewhat uncouth in shape. To the geologist it was the story of the cearth's making from almost the beginning of time.
