The Portland man had not been assigned to any definite location when he left this city, although he considered it probable that he would be given work in some of the hospitals for wounded in England. The English are preparing for the accommodation of some 6,000 or 50,000 wounded in that country this Spring, and as a consequence a great deal of medical aid will be required there.

"In a great world we need a great religion. It will not do to face the future with something that may be outgrown. Eucken speaks of a man wingrown. Eucken speaks of a man wingrown of the property of the congregation to stand firm grown. Eucken speaks of a man winning an universal self, what man really needs is to link himself with an universal faith. One world at a time is essentially a false philosophy because the soul transcends all worlds, being involved in the universe and reaches beyond into the heart and mind of God himself. That was what St. Peter meant in reply to the Master's question, "To whom shall we go? Thou has the words of eternal life."

"Peter must have felt, and I presume many since him have felt, that for a great world a great christ was needed. A small Christ and a small salvation fits ill in a great world."
