The Flower Fairies' Ball. IT WAS moonlight in the woods. Under the tall trees was the deep, black shadow of midnight, but out in the open the glow was a golden mist that turned everything to sheeny yellow.

The flower fairies were in the garden of the damp ferns. And on the warm, sweet night air there was the strange silvery singing as if a thousand tiny birds were trilling under the leaves.

A circle of green in the center of the grove was smooth and covered with soft grass whose tufts were tiny beards of grain so closely woven together as to form a carpet.

Down near the foot of this grove in the jungle was the home of a big tigress and her three cubs. They could hear the soft music trembling on the breeze, and as they listened they lifted their huge heads and wrinkled their tawny skins.

"What is that, mother?" asked the youngest fellow, whose name was

Brownie. "I never heard this noise before."

"The mother tiger has not," purred the mother tiger as she rubbed Spot's back with her paw, "but it is the fairies—they are having a ball in the full of the August moon."

"I think I will creep up and see the fun," remarked the oldest cub. "I have never seen a fairy yet."

"No," replied the mother quickly. "That would be very wrong. Don't you know that if any living animals ever peeped at the fairies when dancing they would be turned at once to flowers themselves? Don't go near the spot—it would be very dangerous and I should never see you again."

"I CAN'T SPEAK THIS $200 A MONTH FOR A COAT WITHOUT GOING INTO DEBT"

"I wonder if I shall ever see the day when I shall be able to spend a sizable sum for clothes without either saving for weeks before or paying back for weeks afterward?"

"Likely as not you'll never be so happily situated as that, Louie, so in meantime, isn't it wiser that you can BUY YOUR CLOTHES ON CREDIT AT CHERRY'S?"

"That coat, for instance: A few dollars' down and weekly or monthly installments will buy it. One that you'll be mightily proud of, too, for I never saw finer assortments of Summer wearables than CHERRY'S are showing."

"There's a system and an ease about CHERRY'S CREDIT PLAN and it seems just what it is—a business arrangement handled courteously, and with the convenience of the customer considered first. It takes away the worry, and the moderate prices at that lovely shop take away the high cost of dressing."

"No," replied the mother quickly. "That would be very wrong. Don't you know that if any living animals ever peeped at the fairies when dancing they would be turned at once to flowers themselves? Don't go near the spot—it would be very dangerous and I should never see you again."

"The little cub called Brownie listened very carefully. He had always wanted to see a fairy, and thought it would be fun to chase them about just as many children do the lightning bugs in Summer. But he did not say a word to his mother about it. The family stayed away for a long time, but presently all except the youngest were stretched out on their bed of leaves and snoring loudly."

Brownie knew this was his chance. Creeping carefully he managed to get out of the bed without waking the others, then he tramped softly toward the circle where the fairies were dancing in the moonlight.

The Queen of the fairies sat at the head of the banquet and began the feast by holding aloft a tiny golden goblet of wine. At this sight the mischievous Brownie decided to break up the party. So arching his back for a moment he sprang into the air and came pouncing down in the midst of the crowd.

In a moment there was the wildest confusion, and every fairy ran, but only for a moment. For the Queen remembered her power in an instant. In a second time there was no young tiger there at all—only standing solitary in the center of the green circle a little white mouse, and a tiny gold rod with a red tassel, and a tiny gold rod with a red tassel, and a tiny gold rod with a red tassel.

By dawn the fairies had gone, but there still stood the lily awaying on its stem, longing to be a tiger cub, and hating to know that for millions and millions of years, till the fairies grew old—which took millions and millions of years—it must be a tiger lily.
