After congratulations had been showered, tables were arranged for cards, refreshments being served, followed by dancing.

THE SANDMAN STORY

By MRS. FAWALKER

Pete's Gold Mine.
SHAGGY PETE was only a dusty, stray burro, but then Pete had sense. Now a burro is a small, tough donkey used in the West for climbing mountains and hauling things to mining camps, and is not generally supposed to have much brains. But Pete was different. He took so good care of little Ada as if he were a nurse with cap and apron, and would even pull himself up on his back by his tail to get to the top of a high rock to get to the top of the rock full in the light of the setting sun.

"Oh, father, father," she cried, so delighted with her find that she forgot her bruises. "Look what I have found. It's gold and Pete did it!" It took the father but a few seconds to scramble down and clasp his little daughter in his arms. And when she showed him the shining yellow in the rocks Peter had broken off and the big place on the cliff where it glittered in large veins, the father shouted with joy.

A very happy man and child they were as they climbed home and managed to drag Pete along, and, of course, Pete was not sold. And when Mr. Bedford built a beautiful home on the mountain near the gold mine, Pete had a fine, warm stable, and everybody called the place Pete's mine.

For when the father came he said sadly that he would have to sell dear old Pete because his money had all been spent. And they would have to get down to some town and the father found work, though if he could stay a few months longer on the mountain he would be a well man.

Ada knew that her father was to take Pete away to sell at noon the next day, so directly after breakfast she put on her climbing harness on his back. Then with her chubby legs bumping against his sides she set out, following a path across the mountain, winding through the pines until they stood at the top of a high rock. Just below was a grassy bit of level ground hidden by towering trees. She started to hide her pet so her father could not find him.

So she climbed down from Pete's back and began to pull on the bridle as she slid down the rock. But the tiny feet slipped and the child fell, rolling over and over down the slanting face of the cliff, till she landed, bruised, but not hurt, on the grass at the bottom. In falling she had jerked Pete, too, and he fell, but not in exactly the same direction as Ada. Kicking and knocking rocks about, he came bounding down to the bottom, until he scrambled to his feet and began to nibble the fine grass.

Just then she heard a voice calling and some one running up the path. With glad cry she answered back, and in a moment her father stood at been given recently and therefore cannot be repeated at present. You might try the following:

White layer cake—One-half cup butter or one-third cup crisco, cup sugar, one-half cup milk, two cups sifted flour, three level teaspoons baking powder, whites of three eggs, one-eighth teaspoon salt if butter is used, or one-fourth teaspoon salt with crisco, and desired flavoring. Cream the butter and sugar, add the milk gradually with a small quantity of flour to maintain same consistency as creamed butter. Fold in alternately the egg whites beaten stiff, and the remainder of the flour sifted with the baking powder. Do not stir, but "beat" in the first part of the mixing, and "fold" in the last part, being sure that the texture is even. Leave a hollow in the center of the batter when placed in well greased cake pans. A sheet of greased paper fitted to the bottom of the pan is often a great help in securing even baking. Bake in two layers about 25 minutes.
