Now the goblin knew that these fairles must have their paints, for if they did not the woods on the opposite side of the earth would have to go without any green and that would be something terrible. So he grabbed up the paint pots, and? kissing his wife, flew out of the door, saying he would be back before dawn.

The goblin had not been gone over an hour when the wife began to grow restless and thirsty, but she could not rise to get a drink of water. In each of the flowers there was plenty of it, standing on their soft petals in shining drops, but they each refused to allow the little ciffn woman to share their portion. the little ciffn woman to share their portion.

"I cannot give you my water," said the rose, haughtily. "It is all I have and I may need it before the goblin returns." The other flowers talked in the same way. There they all slood, proudly swaying in the warm air, and the water drops twinkling in the light, but not one would give a drink to the poor little sick goblin wife.

No, there was one—one humble, pale blossom that seemed almost afraid to speak. But it held its head up bravely at last, and, bending down so the cool drops fell on the hot lips of the little goblin, it trembled with pleasure at seeing the look of gratitude in her eyes. The water refreshed her so that she sat up, feeling much better. Then, as the goblin did not come, she grew weary again.

she sat up, feeling much better. Then, as the goblin did not come, she grew weary again.

Now the poppy knew that down in the center of its heart was a tiny drop of a scothing liquid which would make the p iin and weariness go, so it bowed again and said in a low voice, "Squeeze the liquid out of my heart into your mouth and you will sleep well, waking refreshed."

The goblin's wife pressed the heart of the poppy into her lips and out of it came a watery juice which tasted strange, but made her feel rested and sleepy. So in a sound slumber she grew better, and when the husband goblin returned it was to see his wife well. Of course he was angry with the proud plants. And equally pleased with the poor little poppy.

Taking its pale blossom in his hands, he asked it what gift it desired. The poppy thought about the beautiful pink of the roses, the gorgeous purple of the pansy, the blue of the forgetme-not, the yellow of the buttercup, then of its own pale, sickly bloom.

"I would love very, very much." it stammered, "to be a red, rich red, lovely red. And I would like all the people of the world to know the medicine which lies down deep in my heart, so it can ease the world's pain."
