HIGH JAPANESE HERE

Forestry Official Studies Reserves in United States.

MIKADO CONSERVES WOODS

R. Nakai, Secretary of Imperial Bureau, Will Spend Three Weeks in Northwest Wilds to Learn Methods Being Used.

Were you aware that 75 per cent of the total area of Japan is forest? It is, said R. Nakai, Secretary of the Forestry Bureau of the Imperial Japanese Government and Chief Forester of the Tokyo district, who arrived in Portland yesterday, declared that his work was similar to that of foresters in the woods.

Another thing not generally known, and of which Mr. Nakai is particularly proud, is the forest conservation practiced in Japan. An almost perfect system of reforestation has been in operation there for more than 50 years, he said.

Mr. Nakai was the guest yesterday of the Japanese Consul, R. Kusanagi. He expects to remain in the Northwest about three weeks, studying the National forests, and carries a letter of introduction to District Forester Cecil from Chief Forester Graves. The Japanese visitor came to the United States June 7, landing at San Francisco, and that time has been in Washington, D. C., and in the small National forests in Wisconsin and New York.

Visitor Assures Against Spying. "I am in your country to study—really I have no desire to spy on your military resources," he said, laughing, to the Consul, in Japanese, and his remarks were translated.

In Japan, said Mr. Nakai, there are seven major districts into which the forests are divided. Mr. Nakai is in charge of probably the most important, the Tokyo district. The forests are divided somewhat as are American reserves.

The national forests of Japan are under an efficient system of reforestation. All trees cut down are immediately removed and in the cleared space new trees are sown at once. The forest grows into healthy maturity in 80 or 100 years.

The principal trees in Japan are cedar, spruce, Japanese pine, oak and birch. Through the national forests are fire lines—cleared spaces 40 feet across, in which no grasses or weeds are allowed to grow. Fires are carefully regulated and every 5000 acres is in charge of a ranger.

Exports Larger Than Imports. Japan, said Mr. Nakai, exports more lumber than it imports. Exports are principally to Korea and parts of China.

The American forestry system impressed the visitor as economical and efficient, with less labor employed than in Japan, but more machinery.

Neutrality Advice Ends Row in Home Over War.

Patrolman Bales Quits Difficulty Between German Husband and Scotch-Irish Wife, Who Disagree Over Conflict.

H. C. BALES, motorcycle patrolman, played the role of mediator yesterday. At 2:20 P. M. yesterday the police headquarters received a telephone message asking for an officer at the home of A. G. Bitter, at 2925 Delano street, Montavilla, where a husband was quarreling with his wife. Patrolman Bales was immediately dispatched to the scene of marital difficulties.

"The whole trouble is that my husband is German and I am Scotch-Irish," said Mrs. Bitter. "It is absolutely impossible for us to agree on anything."

"Would you wish to file any charges against him, and appear in court?" asked the patrolman.

"No, I wouldn't want to do that," replied the woman.

Patrolman Bales remembered the part of a peaceful nation in war times. "I gave them both some advice on neutrality, and left," he reported, laconically.

Yesterday Myer appeared before Mrs. Margaret Thoroman, head of the Juvenile Court home-seeking department. She is seeking employment for him. He has a working permit.

One time this lad stepped from the straight and narrow path, and landed at the State Training School for Boys, near Salem. There he learned to sew, tolerably well. Then he was released and had nothing to do. All alone, he went before Judge Gatens and asked to be sent back so that he might finish his studies and learn his trade as a tailor.
