taken by assault yesterday.

The Russians still hold Ostrow, some 25 miles to the southward of Lomza, but their only purpose in holding it is to delay as long as possible the advance of the victorious Germans and enable the Russian armies to get clear of the widespread net in which the Teutons are trying to envelop the forces of the Grand Duke Nicholas.

DODTI AND MEN IN CHARCE

Vilna to Be Evacuated.

That the Russians are getting ready for a further retreat seems clear from the news that preparations are making for the evacuation of the important City of Vilna, a link in the chain of forts of the second line of defense. forts of the second line of defense.
This information was quite unexpected in London, as the latest official bulletins from Petrograd conveyed the impression that the German rush in that quarter had been stemmed.
The sudden change of front indicates that developments must have supervened to induce the Russians to surrender the railroad junction.

Germans Checked Near Riga

A dispatch to the Geneva Tribune from Innsbruck, Austria, says that in the recent fighting along the section of the eastern front running from the Pissa River to Ostrow, northeast of Warsaw, the Germans lost $5,000 men in killed or wounded, but succeeded capturing the principal fortified poeitlens of the Russians.

The proclamation of Prince Leopold of Bavaria to the Inhabitants of Warsaw is textually reproduced in the Cologne Gazette from the Lodger Zeitung of Lodg, Poland, according to the Amsterdam correspondent of Reuter's News Agency, who transmits it as fellows:

COTTAGE GROVE, Or. Aug. 10.— (Special.)—Last Thursday was hooded day on the Oregon, Pacific & Eastern Railway. Three accidents happened on that day during the trip from here to Bujada and return.

Just the other side of the Walden bridge a Greek, who had been working at Bujada and was coming into the city on a handcar, ran into the Oregon, Pacific & Eastern engine head-on. He apparently had not seen the train at all. Man and car were thrown off the track. The man was not injured and the train did not stop. At Wildwood a cow duplicated the performance of the handcar, and its life was the price paid. The train did not stop.

The third accident was the breaking of one of the springs on the engine.

SEVEN SONS ARE STRICKEN

Killed in Action, Seventh Is Has Given all to Country.

(Copyright, 1515, by the Chicago Tribune Published by arrangement.)

PARIS, July 20 .- This is a little story of France. I suppose it is no more nor less the story of a hundred thou-sand homes. Grief and sorrow and death are the common denominators of war and the mother I am going to tell you about probably has suffered no more than the other million mothers more than the other million mothers and wives scattered over this cruelly tried country.

Last September on my way to Italy I stopped off at Clermont-Ferrand after a dreadful 25-hour trip from Paris with nothing to eat the entire time, no sleep and an apartment crowded with refugees.

sleep and an apartment crowded with refugees.

At Clermont I had no better luck. I tried the 10 hotels the town—a really good-sized one, capital of the Puy-le-Dome department—afforded, and they were all crowded, not a room to be had. Then I began a house-to-house search, but each family harbored refugees from the north, from Belgium or from the east, Nancy, Luneville and those towns. those towns

The next day I heard their several and individual histories. I learned that their mother on the first moment of war had turned over to the government a factory for the manufacture of cloth, these immense mineral works so important to the manufacture of melinite. that most deadly of explosives, and two natural springs.

"I am willing to give everything to the patrie," she said, with a simple, wide gesture of largesse. "My seven sons—and often I have wished that my

This indomitable souled woman

She thought, "This is the first!" But I was not there when the first newscame. She pressed me to stay with them all Summer in that high, cool spot, but I left, and after an exchange of two notes I heard of her no more. At New Year's I sent her a little note and got no reply. But yesterday, as I went by a hospital on the Rue de Rivoil. I saw a woman in black coming out of the door, and I looked twice before I could recognize Mme. Deranger, I hurried to her and called her by name.

"Comment ca va?" I asked, proffering the phrase with the customary carelessness of the usual "Good day."

"How does everything go?" she repeated slowly after me. "With me. hadly. But I believe the country will be saved. One must always have faith, that is the most important thing. I suppose things could be worse. I can hardly imagine it.

I tried to murmur, whisper some word, some sound. But my throat was light. I gouldn't say a word for horror.

Family Tragically Bereaved.

"They are all gone." she said quietly, at the same time making that simple wide gesture she had made long ago in September, when she said. "I am willing to give everything to the Patrie."

"Not ail." I cried, not all those seven sons—oh, not ail?" and my voice pleaded with her.

"All but Henri, and he is hers," and she pointed to the building from which we had not stirred; "he is here, yes, but one leg is gone and he is blind. And, too," she continued with difficulty, "he is not quite right yet; the strain, you know. He had been made Lieutenant and when his Captain was killed he took command and was in a trench for aix hours sunder that high shell fire. Besides taking his body it has taken his mind, too. But that will be cured in time, they say, and then I can have one boy home."

I was mute. What are words in the face of a grief like this? I tried so hard to say something, but she leaned toward me and patted my hand soothingly as if I were the one to be comforted.
