L. O. Roark Disappears From San Francisco, Reaching New York Later.

TALE OF HARDSHIP TOLD

Former Oregon Resident Assaulted at Night—Recovers at Sea—Is Stranded in Peru—Works Way to United States.

Robbed, assaulted and stranded at Balboa, Peru, L. O. Roark, who disappeared while representing the Hotel News, a Portland paper, at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, finally has reached New York City by working his way as cabin boy on the steamer Wilkeson.

Mr. Roark's story reads like a story of a hundred days. He says he was attacked while passing a dark alley in San Francisco on the night of April 1. A quilt was thrown over his head, and having been from behind fell upon his skull and the young man knew no more.

Mr. Roark recovered consciousness in an ill-smelling hole piled full of boxes. He was hungry, thirsty and sick. For hours he lay there, dully wondering where he was, until at last a man's motions and dull wash of water against his person told him that he was on a ship at sea.

He called faintly, but there was no response. He continued calling at intervals, however, until at last a man's head appeared in the hatch. Another shout, and a sailor came running to Roark's assistance.

The man helped Roark to the deck, where he learned that he was on board the Norwegian sailing vessel Callus, and five days out from San Francisco. Only two men aboard the craft were able to speak English.

As he recovered strength on deck, the young man observed that his own garments had been taken from him, and that he was dressed in a ragged wharf-man's garb. Searching his pockets, he found that all his money, about $10, his watch, and all his other property had been taken from him.

He was hailed before the captain and there Roark learned that he was considered a stowaway. The second mate manifested a dislike to the young man which continued to the end of the voyage. After several days the captain began to believe Roark's story, and treated him in a kindly manner.

Thirty-four days out from San Francisco, the Callus arrived at Balboa and began taking on a cargo of nitrate for Norway. Roark was abandoned to his own resources. For two days the young man wandered about the dock penniless, hungry and unable to speak the language of the country.
