THE SANDMAN STORY

"I WILL not have that parrot about the house another day," angrily exclaimed Mr. Preston.

He had just come home and was standing by the table in the sitting-room looking at the letter that Polly, the parrot, had made about his favorite chair with the fragments of a newspaper.

"Not papa," cried little Lucy, who was Mr. Preston's only child; "please don't send Polly away. I am so lonely all day long when you are away."

"Well, my dear child," replied Mr. Preston, who loved his motherless little daughter better than anything in the world.

"There that is safe until the morning, when I will use it to pay the workmen their monthly wages," he said.

After dinner they played and chatted until Lucy's bedtime.

"If some robber only knew of that money in the safe," he said to himself, as he lay in bed.

But Mr. Preston was mistaken. A robber had learned of the money that Mr. Preston had taken home with him.

Suddenly, from out of the darkness of the corner there came a voice saying: "Well! The robber, who could not see Polly, looked up in terror and stared into the darkness.

"Come quick! Come quick! Come quick!" cried Mr. Preston, who had just been awakened by the sound of the door opening.

"Come quick! Come quick! Come quick!" cried Mr. Preston, who had just been awakened by the sound of the door opening.

"Now, papa," said Lucy, "are you not glad that you didn't send Polly away last evening? If you had, the robber would have gotten all the money in the safe."

"You are right, Lucy," replied Mr. Preston. "Polly certainly saved the money and was the means of our catching the robber. You and she may tear up all the newspapers you wish in the sitting-room."

So Polly was left to play with Lucy to her heart's content.
