rejection. To reach his horse he did not go up the mountain, but along the side...

When the stranger reached the top of the mountain he looked about, but nothing could he see but trees and rocks...

But the stick seemed to have lost its charm now. There were no briars to clear away and the stranger held it loosely in his hand...

Tying his horse to a tree, the stranger went toward the mountain and looked for a place to rest.

It came from the rock, and as the stranger drew near to it he walked very carefully so that his steps might not be heard...

This rock stood on the very top of the mountain and close to the edge was so that one end of it was at the side of the mountain...

All this time the sighing continued and the stranger swung himself out over the edge of the mountain by taking a grip of twigs and bits of projecting rock...

Yes, the rock did have an opening, and on a long stone shaped like a couch lay a beautiful maiden, her eyes closed and her hands folded over her breast...

If it had not been for the sighing which came from her lips the rock would have thought she was made of marble, so still and white she looked.

But what the villagers did not see was what happened when the stranger disappeared among the trees.

He looked about for something, and where the briars grew the thickest he found it: it was a big tree, with long, slender branches...

But the stranger held tight to the branch with both hands, and though his clothes were torn almost to tatters and his hands were sore from the sharp spines he managed to reach his horse and mounted holding the stick all the time.

And now a strange thing happened. The stranger held the stick before him and it turned the pointed end toward the top of the mountain at the very center.

The stranger knew why he had had trouble in getting back to his horse: he was going in the wrong direction.

Baking Helps Learn to Regulate the Heat of Your Oven By Mrs. Janet McKenzie Hill, Editor of the Boston Cooking School Magazine

There is just one way to make your cakes rise high and keep an even surface. Have your oven moderate at first, until the cake is fully risen; then increase the heat, so as to brown it over quickly. Extreme heat stiffens the dough. If you stiffen the outside of the cake before the rising is complete, you stop the rising process. Then the leavening gas, forming inside, will bulge up the center, where the dough is still soft, and spoil the shape of the cake.

NOTE—Biscuits or other pastries made from stiff dough, that are cut into shapes for the oven, bake in a hot oven. This is because the cut surfaces of the dough do not sear over, but rather leave the pores open, allowing the leavening gas to escape and the heat to penetrate readily. Small ovens cool quickly; therefore they should be made several degrees hotter than a larger oven, and the less the door is opened the better. Do not attempt to bake bread and pastry together. Bread requires prolonged, moderate baking—pastry the reverse.

Have a strong underheat for baking powder preparations, especially pastry. These are only a few of the many baking helps found in the K C Cook's Book—a copy of which may be secured by sending the colored certificate taken from a 25-cent can of K C Baking Powder to the JAGURS MFG. Co., Chicago.

THE SANDMAN STORY By Mrs. F. WALKER

The Sighing Mountain. Part I.

ONCE upon a time in a far-off country there was a big mountain near a village that the people called the Sighing Mountain, because on Summer evenings when the wind was blowing gently it sounded as if some one were on top of the mountain sighing.

The mountain was covered with thick growths of briars and prickly trees, and after going half way all were glad to return, and so it had been many years since anyone had made the attempt, when one day there came a stranger to the little village and heard the sighing of the big mountain.

There is no use trying to find out what makes the sighing, the old people told the stranger. "It has been tried many times, and each one who went failed to get farther than halfway up the mountain."

"Ah, but is just why I want to try," replied the stranger. "I shall start at daybreak tomorrow."

All the village people were out to see the stranger start, for he was a stranger to them. He told them he would tell his name when he returned, and the old men shook their heads and said, "He will never return, for when he finds he has failed he will ride away by another road."

But he did not return in the time they had expected, and then they grew frightened by his long absence, but there was no sign of him to be seen on the mountain, and the sighing was heard as usual that night.

But what the villagers did not see was what happened when the stranger disappeared among the trees.

He looked about for something, and where the briars grew the thickest he found it: it was a big tree, with long, slender branches, and this the stranger tried to reach by sending his horse over the briars, but the faithful animal could not be made to go, so the rider dismounted and climbed through and over the sharp bushes until he came to the tree, where he broke off a branch as long as twice the length of his arm, but when he tried to return to his horse he found he had trouble in holding the branch, for it was so heavy that he had to go toward his horse, for the branch drew him in another direction.

But the stranger held tight to the branch with both hands, and though his clothes were torn almost to tatters and his hands were sore from the sharp spines he managed to reach his horse and mounted holding the stick all the time.

And now a strange thing happened. The stranger held the stick before him and it turned the pointed end toward the top of the mountain at the very center.

The stranger knew why he had had trouble in getting back to his horse: he was going in the wrong direction.
